PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 15, 1920.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 11, 1920.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I send to the desk the credentials of the Hon. BRAXTON BRAGG COMER, of Alabama, who has been appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Senator BANKHEAD. I wish to say that I have submitted these credentials to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that he assures me they are in proper form. I ask that Mr. COMER may now take the oath of office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed, as follows:

STATE OF ALABAMA,
Executive Department.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that, pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Alabama, I, Thomas E. Kilby, the governor of the said State, do hereby appoint BRAXTON BRAGG COMER a Senator from the said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein, caused by the death of Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, is filled by election, as provided by law.

Witness his excellency our governor, Thomas E. Kilby, and our seal hereto affixed at the capitol, in the city of Montgomery, this 5th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1920.

THOS. E. KILBY, Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.] WM. P. COBB, Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator appointed will present himself at the desk to take the oath.

Mr. COMER, escorted by Mr. UNDERWOOD, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him by the President pro tempore, he took his seat in the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment and road-making material to various services and departments of the Government, and for the use of the States.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is upon the substitute offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. BECKHAM. Out of order I should like to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that pending the execution of the unanimous-consent agreement, nothing else is in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I direct the attention of the Chair to the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into on Saturday with a view of asking for the interpretation which the Chair puts upon it. Has the Chair the agreement before him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has carefully studied the agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. I ask the Chair what construction he places upon that part of the agreement which provides that without further debate to-day we shall vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that all amendments to the proposed reservation must be disposed of during the calendar day. The Chair is inclined to think that the reservation itself, as originally reported or as it may be amended, may be voted upon after the expiration of the calendar day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Chair about that, but my suggestion was that the agreement states "that on the calendar day of Monday, March 15, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to reported reservation No. 2." My impression is that the provision "without further debate" was in the original consent agreement tendered by the Senator from Massachusetts when he proposed that at not later than 3 o'clock to-day without debate the Senate should vote, and that in the confusion of the modification of the agreement thereafter, when we added that every Senator should have at least five minutes upon amendments to the reservation, the Secretary neglected to strike out the limitation without debate. I think it is inconsistent with the provision that we shall have 15 minutes upon each reservation and 5 minutes upon amendments thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There may be some confusion or uncertainty in the language of the agreement, but the Chair intends to hold that there may be debate during the calendar day according to the last clause of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Chair is correct about that. As I understand it, upon all amendments to the modification of reservation No. 2 no Senator can speak more than once or more than five minutes. Is that correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not intend to follow literally rulings that have been heretofore made with respect to an agreement of this character. He does not intend to depart from them in spirit, but in view of the situation, which is that certain substitutes have been offered for the original reservation, the Chair intends to hold that a Senator in speaking upon a substitute may be permitted to speak for 20 minutes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. By "a substitute" I suppose the Chair means any amendment to the modification which has been proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Any substitute is technically an amendment, but——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. All substitutes are amendments, but all amendments are not substitutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The interpretation of the agreement which the Chair intends to apply, unless he is overruled by the Senate, is this: The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is speaking upon his amendment. The Chair did rule that he might speak under the unanimous-consent agreement for 20 minutes, upon the assumption that he is devoting 15 minutes of that time to the original resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, the Senator from New Jersey will have exhausted all of his time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, if thereafter another amendment be proposed, that particular Senator would be limited to five minutes upon that amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, a Senator will be able to apportion his time in one speech so that he can use 20 minutes upon a substitute and the reservation combined, so to speak?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not given that particular matter any thought.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought that was what the Chair stated in relation to the substitute proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will remember that the agreement provides that a Senator shall speak but once and not more than 20 minutes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; but once upon each amendment. My inquiry is a practical one, because it is important for a Senator, in arranging his remarks in advance, to know whether he has 5 minutes or 20 minutes. In other words, the modification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts and amendments to it are so blended and intertwined—I believe that is the technical word—that it is very difficult to confine one's whole 15 minutes in a speech simply to the modification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts and then take 5 minutes and confine one's remarks strictly to the amendment proposed to the modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to construe the rule liberally for the purpose of debate, but is not prepared to go to the length suggested by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then we shall have to feel it out in practice.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as to voting on the reservation itself, it seems to me the unanimous-consent agreement is clear. It says "immediately thereafter"; that is, if we proceed until midnight and then conclude the substitutes and amendments, the vote comes "immediately thereafter" on the reservation and the matter could not go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that if the amendments are disposed of by the end of the calendar day, then there must be an immediate vote upon the reservation as amended or as originally reported. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] in the nature of a substitute for the reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as modified.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there has been some suggestion made in view of the amendment offered to the modification reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that I withdraw my amendment. In view of the fact, however, that the amendment or substitute offered by me clearly states what I believe to be the position of those who earnestly feel that no obligation should be imposed upon this country to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations, and that my reservation clearly expresses that idea, I do not feel at the present time, in view of the further fact that no debate has yet been had upon the Lodge reservation, that I should withdraw my amendment. I do not intend to take the full limit of 20 minutes which, under the ruling of the Chair, has been allotted to me. I simply wish to express briefly, in from 5 to 10 minutes, my position in regard to the substitute which I have offered.

Last week I stated that the question before us was plain and simple. Will or will not the United States undertake to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations?

It is now evident that that is not the only question. There is one equally important, one which directly affects the reputation, in fact, the very self-respect, of the Senate. This body is charged with the duty of stating whether we do or do not agree to the treaty proposed. We are but the agents, the servants, of the people. Does it require argument on my part to demonstrate that it is our duty to state our position in language so clear that it can not be misunderstood, and not in language which will mean one thing to one man and the very opposite to another, or in language which will permit two Senators holding directly opposite opinions to vote the same way?

For nearly a century and a half we have stood aloof from Europe. We have followed the advice of the immortal Washington. We have avoided entangling alliances. It is now argued that the advice of Washington is antediluvian. It is proposed that we join in a world federation, the boundaries of which we should view with the respect that we have shown those of our own States, that we should accord them like protection, and that to insure such protection we should give them that which has not been given to our own States, an unconditional written guaranty.

Opposed to such views are those who point to our remarkable growth and prosperity, extending over a century; to the fact that we are not skilled in the diplomacy of the Old World; that if we obligate ourselves as proposed we will not only have to take part in every dispute throughout the world but may find it difficult, if not impossible, to refuse to join a nation which if we were unfettered by any promises we would oppose rather than protect.

Are we willing to guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations? Before giving an answer we must decide what the effects are to our self-respect.

We know that the attention of the country is riveted upon us. There is no use of our blinking the fact that money has been spent in the process of our delay and our inability to dispose of the treaty. The people have tolerated delay, but they are in no mood to stand equivocation. They can not brook a trimmer, a man or body of men who try to carry water on both shoulders, who try to blow hot and cold.

We owe it to our country, to our people, and the other parties to the treaty to state either that we, the United States, will or will not guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations. As honest men we must use language that the American people can understand. We will be false to ourselves and false to our constituents if we employ phrases that they do not understand; phrases which will require a court or tribunal, or, perchance, the council of the league, to decide whether we have or have not given a guaranty.

If the Senate should vote its conclusion as to article 10 in language which is susceptible of two constructions, one that we have given a guaranty and the other that we have not, then I say, and I am sure the people will say, that the Senate is the home of the trimmers.

About a week ago a reservation known as the Watson-Simmons reservation was submitted. We were assured that it changed not the substance but merely the form of what is known as the Lodge reservation. It required but little discussion to surround it with some doubt. During the discussion the President wrote the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and made clear that our military and naval forces could not be employed under article 10 unless Congress so decreed; that the reservation was in effect a mere act of supererogation.

Notwithstanding his letter another compromise reservation was prepared, and on Friday last it was stated with emphasis that it changed only the form and not the substance of the original Lodge reservation. Time will not permit me to discuss it at length, but if we say that the United States undertakes to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of India by its military forces, if Congress so decrees, wherein does such a declaration, in so far as it applies to our military forces, differ from one in which it is implied that the United States assumes full obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of India by its military forces if Congress so decrees?

Hair splitters might find a difference, but rail splitters never. If the famous "rail splitter" should propose to negative any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of India, no one here would so dishonor his reputation as to suggest that he would use language equivocal in meaning. He said what he meant, and he meant what he said. So also should we. I venture to say that there are many lawyers in the Senate who were they retained to settle the point would argue that the proposed compromise would not destroy the obligation under article 10. Who will say that the legal lights who have advised that the compromise reservation leaves no obligation would not argue the contrary if retained for that purpose?

In its issue following the publication of the reservation the New York Times, a paper which has strongly urged ratification of the obligation imposed by article 10, editorially proclaimed the reservation as acceptable and one to which no reasonable friend of the treaty could object. Why? Because, forsooth, in its opinion, the substance of article 10 was not affected, as the reservation was merely declaratory of our constitutional practices; that the reservation amounted to nothing more than to take the President's word for "a mere act of supererogation." And, no doubt, he would so describe it to other nations should it be adopted here and if the treaty were afterwards ratified. Fearing that the reservation might mean one thing to one Senator and the direct opposite to another I have proposed a substitute, which I will read:

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country.

The United States assumes no obligation to interfere in controversies between nations or to employ its military or its naval forces or its resources for any purpose under any article of the treaty.

I do not think that anyone can misunderstand that proposed reservation. Those who favor it proclaim not only to the Senate but to the country and the Nation that the United States should not, and shall not, obligate itself to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other States. Do not those who oppose it proclaim that the United States should and shall obligate itself at least to some extent?

If my reservation is rejected, will not the world have the right to believe that we favor some obligation? If my reservation is rejected, I warn you that, whatever may be our attitude as to article 10, it must be stated in language which will admit of no doubt, because, should our meaning be doubtful, it will be resolved in favor of an obligation, if the record shows that we were offered an opportunity to repudiate one and refused so to do.

We all know that the record will be read to ascertain our meaning. Therefore those who oppose an obligation, before voting against a plain statement that the United States assumes none, should consider that fact. If you so vote, it will become your imperative duty to make whatever reservation to article 10 which may be accepted so clear that the reference to your vote on the reservation proposed by me will not be necessary to ascertain your meaning. The original Lodge reservation was debated throughout the country. Its meaning is understood. Why is it abandoned? Is it not the hope to speak equivocally to catch the unthoughtful?

The compromise reservation which was so loudly praised on Friday last is even now the subject of amendment. If it was perfection when proposed, why the change? Who will now vouch for its perfection? Perhaps debate will show that its meaning is clear. Of its meaning I am not sure. Of the meaning of the original Lodge reservation I am sure. Of the meaning of the reservation which I have proposed I am likewise sure. It is a flat denial of any obligation on the part of the United States to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations. Those who oppose such an obligation, and who are not afraid to vote in accordance with their convictions will, I am sure, favor such a reservation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, whatever may be the fate of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], I, not only as one of his associates in this body but as an American citizen, desire to express my thanks for his manly courage in presenting this issue just as it is.

The American people are not going to be deceived by any shell game of politics, any proposition of "Now you see it and now you do not see it." We are here to decide whether the United States shall assume the obligation to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of other members of the league, or whether it shall not; and the only honest way to express an issue of that kind is in plain English that the ordinary man upon the street can read and understand. All of the camouflage of language, all of the twisting of words, which, as Kipling said of phrases, is only an art of knaves to deceive fools, can not deceive the American people.

What the American people want to know is, Are their sons and their fathers and their husbands to be drafted and drawn into foreign wars, and are they to be taxed for their maintenance, or are they not? If they are, we must assume this obligation; and if we assume the obligation, that is the logical result. If we are not, we ought to have the frankness and the manhood to say so.

There may be some who can not differentiate between the things that are important and the things that they understand; but I think in this case the American people thoroughly understand this issue, and credit is due to the distinguished Senator from New Jersey for presenting it so frankly and so plainly that, as he said the other day, they who run may read and understand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to be heard briefly on this amendment.

Entirely irrespective of the prospects of success which this substitute of the Senator from New Jersey may stand, it seems to me that each Senator certainly must have in his own mind, whether he has been able to express it clearly to his colleagues and to the public or not, a clear conception of what he wants to accomplish in this matter. If a Senator does not want to assume this obligation to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of other countries, it can not be so that he is confused, if he is old enough and fit to have gotten to the United States Senate, by a declaration that he declines to assume such obligation. So that the intent and purport of the substitute proposed by the Senator from New Jersey is clear, and it is just that—the United States assumes no obligation.

Now, everybody can understand that, both at home and abroad. If that is what we want to do, we should vote for the substitute of the Senator from New Jersey. But look at it: On the other hand, the trouble with voting this down is that if we decline to say that we do not accept any obligation, what is the situation? Why, the Senate will be on record as having declined to repudiate the obligation which the treaty places upon us. What is the inference? The inference is that we accept some kind of an obligation to protect the political independence and territorial integrity of all the members of the league.

Is that the kind of a position we want to get into? If that is not true, then the advocates of the modification as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts must say that that modification just as effectually repudiates the obligation as does the substitute proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, but it takes ten times more words to do it in.

There can be no doubt that if they mean the same thing, the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts is much more involved and complicated, because without in the first line of it repudiating the obligation, it specifies a whole lot of different means which we decline to use in carrying the obligation into effect if it exists, and then in terms, away down toward the latter part, by the interpolation suggested by the Senator from Idaho and agreed to by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts it proceeds to except; it proceeds to state that we will not enter into controversies between other nations in relation to the very two subjects as to which the treaty places the obligation upon us; that is, in relation to the political independence and territorial integrity of other countries. So that as it stands now, the modification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the original Lodge reservation, adopted by the Senate heretofore, weaves in and weaves out, through a tangled skein of rehearsals and exceptions, to the same result attained by the Senator from New Jersey in his proposal; and I agree entirely with the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], that if we are not to bind this country to maintain the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the league the American voters would rather have us say so in plain, blunt, Anglo-Saxon, Yankee language than to vote for a declaration which can only be the source of international confusion and conflict, and probably the basis for charges of treachery against us, when the members of the league who think they have something to rely upon discover that they have been deceived and are relying upon a broken reed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is to be expected that those Senators who desire the defeat of the treaty should play first upon one side, to show those who are opposed to reservations that the reservations are too strong, and then upon the other side, to show those who want very strong reservations that the reservations are not strong enough, and they have done it with great ability. Indeed, we may certainly pay the 14 or 16 men who are opposed to ratification the tribute of having shown a skill, an ingenuity, and a force that is remarkable.

I am in favor of ratifying the treaty. I am in favor of yielding some of my own views to have the reservations in a shape where other Senators will accept them. If I were the only person who had to vote for ratification, I would vote for the substitute of the Senator from New Jersey; but, unfortunately, I am not.

If we wish to ratify the treaty, we must make some concessions. I could not vote to ratify if it carried the obligation to send our boys, our soldiers, and our Navy into the wars of the world. I could not look the mothers and the daughters and the sweethearts of this country in the face if I had placed upon those dear to them an obligation that would carry them into the wars of the world. That is the part that most concerns me. Without relieving article 10 of that obligation I would not move, I would not vote, to ratify it. But as it is, believing that the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will receive more votes, if adopted, when we come to vote upon ratification, than the substitute of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], I shall vote against the substitute of the Senator from New Jersey, although it is not objectionable to me personally. If I can carry the one great principle into the substitute that our boys are not to be pledged to the wars of the world, I am willing to take a reservation which I hope will gather votes and lead toward ratification.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator whether he is in favor of assuming the obligation of protecting the territorial integrity and political independence of members of this league or not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have answered the Senator. Personally I would prefer to assume no obligation, but I regard it as most important that this treaty should be ratified. I would not, to ratify it, assume the obligation to send our boys into the wars of the world; but, barring that, I would yield my own wishes to obtain ratification.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator will admit——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield for a question. If the Senator wishes to make a speech, I am through.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will frame it as a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator admit that my reservation removes the obligation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Every obligation, as I understand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then why does he not vote for it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have told you. If the Senator can not understand it, I might say I am unfortunate in expression; but I do not think so. I think it is the Senator's misfortune, not mine, for I have stated positively that, while I would prefer it with no obligation, I deem it so important that this treaty should now be ratified, and that during the next 12 months, through the treaty, we should have concluded our peace with Germany and have a voice in the league on matters that pertain to our interests in Europe, I am willing to vote for the treaty with a reservation not as strong as I would prefer the reservation to be. I think the Senator ought to understand me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], in the nature of a substitute for the reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], as modified. On this question the Senator from New Jersey asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have been requested to present to the Senate the reservation which I send to the desk. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table. It substantially reflects my own views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GORE's proposed additional reservation is as follows:

The United States does not, under any article or provision of this treaty or covenant, assume any obligation whatsoever to respect or preserve the existing political status or state of dependency of Armenia, Albania, Dutch East Indies, Egypt, Ireland, Korea, Manchuria, Mongolia, Montenegro, Palestine, Shantung, Syria, nor any colony or dependency of any other nation or Government which colony or dependency was annexed or acquired in any manner except by free and voluntary act or vote of a majority of the inhabitants thereof or their duly elected representatives, and now or hereafter held in involuntary subjection by the military or naval or other forces of an alien nation or power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST answered in the negative.

Mr. LENROOT. We are making some progress. I am glad to find this morning that the phraseology——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will state his point of order.

Mr. PITTMAN. The roll call had been begun, and the Senator from Arizona had answered "nay."

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Wisconsin was trying to secure recognition before the name of the Senator from Arizona was called.

Mr. POMERENE. I distinctly heard the Senator from Wisconsin address the Chair before the response was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is overruled. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, last week we were told by those opposing the Lodge substitute that the language of the original Lodge reservation was sacred; that there must be no change whatever in its phraseology. To-day, in addition to the Senator from New Jersey, we find two other eminent Senators who then took that position who now announce that they will vote for the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. So they have abandoned their position that there must be no change in phraseology.

Then, in addition, I am glad to have this morning the admission of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that the substitute reservation, after all, does relieve the United States of any obligation under article 10 exactly as he says does the substitute of the Senator from New Jersey. But I do want to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey and these other gentlemen to the fact that the substitute of the Senator from New Jersey relieves the United States not only of any obligation under the provisions of article 10, but relieves the United States of all obligation. It relieves the United States of the obligation to impose the economic boycott for a violation of the provisions of articles 12, 13, and 15 of the treaty, which throughout this entire debate it has been admitted was a proper provision to remain in the treaty for a nation going to war without submitting its dispute either to arbitration or to inquiry.

So, Mr. President, the pending substitute is not limited to article 10, but does vitally affect and remove one of the obligations under article 16, which throughout this long controversy it has been admitted it is proper that the United States should assume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. McCORMICK. Let it be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country.

The United States assumes no obligation to interfere in controversies between nations or to employ its military or its naval forces or its resources for any purpose under any article of the treaty.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. He is absent on account of illness, I understand. I am informed that he would vote as I would vote on this matter, and I shall therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent on account of illness in his family, and I have promised to pair with him during the day. I am sure, however, that on this question he would vote as I would vote, and therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when Mr. NELSON's name was called). The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If present and not paired, the senior Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. If the senior Senator from South Carolina were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire if the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and in his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 59, as follows:

So Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's substitute for Mr. LODGE's substitute, as modified, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to offer as a substitute for the pending amendment what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Massachusetts, insert:

The United States assumes no obligation to employ its military or naval forces or the economic boycott to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any other article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war, shall, by act or joint resolution, so provide. Nothing herein shall be deemed to impair the obligation in article 16 concerning the economic boycott.

Mr. KIRBY. Article 10 of the treaty reads as follows:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

It was understood when this provision was written that the United States agreed thereby to guarantee the political independence and territorial integrity of all members of the league, and that its armed forces, its Army and its Navy, might be used to carry out this agreement and enforce the guaranty. There has been proposed a reservation by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], of the Foreign Relations Committee, that limits and restricts the obligation of article 10 to some extent, an interpretative reservation, if you please, and to that I have offered as a substitute the reservation just read. This reservation was proposed by a bipartisan conference, as I understand it, with which I had nothing to do in fact, but some Members on the Democratic side and some Members on the Republican side got together and agreed on this form of reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator does not wish to make a misstatement?

Mr. KIRBY. No.

Mr. LENROOT. That is not true.

Mr. KIRBY. They did not agree on this?

Mr. LENROOT. They did not.

Mr. KIRBY. Then I have been mistaken about it. The Democratic members of the conference understood that there was an agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. KIRBY. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Wisconsin is right in his statement. The members of the bipartisan conference did not agree upon this subject, but they thought they were right upon the eve of an agreement upon this substitute when the conferences were discontinued at the instance of the chairman of the conference.

Mr. KIRBY. The statement may be considered modified in accordance with the statements made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], but the Democratic members of this bipartisan conference proposed this as the basis of agreement, as I understand it. After that was proposed the conference broke up without any agreement.

The war has been over more than a year. The Senate has been trying to ratify the treaty or dispose of it for more than eight months, and it has not yet succeeded. After the failure of the bipartisan conferees to get together in an agreement that would be effective, then 40 Democratic Senators on this side of the aisle signed an agreement proposing to the Senators on the other side, who were opposed to ratification without reservation, to support this reservation, and the names of those Senators, as I get them, are Ashurst, Beckham, Chamberlain, Culberson, Dial, Fletcher, Gay, Gerry, Glass, Harris, Harrison, Henderson, Hitchcock, Johnson of South Dakota, Jones of New Mexico, Kendrick, King, Kirby, McKellar, Myers, Nugent, Overman, Owen, Phelan, Pittman, Pomerene, Ransdell, Robinson, Sheppard, Simmons, Smith of Arizona, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Stanley, Swanson, Trammell, Underwood, Walsh of Montana, Wolcott, and the fortieth was the late lamented Senator Bankhead, who is with us no more.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator has stated that these 40 Democrats agreed to support the substitute which he is discussing. Did they also agree to support the treaty with the other reservations that had been accepted or which they knew would be accepted, including the one which the Senator states they signed an agreement to support?

Mr. KIRBY. The written understanding did not extend to anything but the reservation to this particular article, but it was made with a view to compromising and settling the whole matter and ratifying the treaty, and necessarily it implied an agreement to support all of the other reservations as adopted.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator understand that the attitude of those 40 Senators was that they were willing to accept the substitute which he is now discussing and then support the treaty with that substitute and the reservations which had been theretofore adopted to other articles? Is that his understanding?

Mr. KIRBY. That was my understanding, but there was no agreement upon that point; but certainly 40 Senators would not stand up here and propose an agreement on this particular article, the only one upon which the Senate had not been able to get together, just for the fun of the thing.

Mr. WOLCOTT and Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield first to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The proposition made by the 40 Senators was an alternative proposition. It was to support either of two suggested substitutes to reservation No. 2, which is the so-called article 10 reservation. One of those alternative substitutes was that which the Senator from Arkansas has just offered and the other alternative substitute was what is known as the Taft reservation. Has the Senator from Arkansas in his possession the proposal submitted by these 40 Senators, reduced to writing?

Mr. KIRBY. It was reduced to writing and I got the list of names of the Senators from the Senator in whose possession the agreement was placed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has the Senator in his possession the exact language of the proposed agreement?

Mr. KIRBY. The exact language is printed in the substitute I have offered here.

Mr. KING. The terms of the agreement?

Mr. KIRBY. No; I have not the terms of the agreement. It is not on this paper. This contains merely the reservations proposed to be voted for.

Mr. REED. I suggest that the Senator get the record.

Mr. KIRBY. I yield now to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I think there must be some mistake so far as my name is concerned on that list. I have heard several times that I signed that list or agreed to it, but I did not. I have tried to act entirely independently on this matter all the way through. I attended the last caucus some months ago, but I attended that caucus with the distinct understanding that I would not cast my vote in the caucus and would not be bound by the caucus. In the matter to which the Senator from Arkansas refers I think there must be some mistake, because that matter came to my office, and I told the party bringing it that I would not sign it. I desired to make this correction so far as I am concerned.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am afraid there may be some misapprehension as to the statement just made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. The implication seemed to be that there was a caucus for the purpose of binding or which proposed to bind Democrats with respect to the treaty. I wish to state that there was no caucus. There was a conference of some of the Democratic Senators for the purpose of considering the treaty, but there was no proposition to bind anyone, nor was the question even suggested that anyone should be bound by the conference. All friends of the treaty were welcome, whether Democrats or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I did not say it was a caucus or council for the purpose of binding anyone. I simply said that I was invited to attend a caucus for the purpose of discussing this matter, and that I attended the meeting with the distinct understanding that I did not propose to be bound by any caucus, and I have not been bound by the views of anyone so far except my own. I attended the caucus with that understanding and for that purpose. I never said, and I do not think the Senator from Utah can show that I said, there was a caucus for that purpose.

Mr. KIRBY. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KIRBY. I understand I have only five minutes, and other Senators have used that up already. However, I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas will permit the Chair to correct him. The Senator was recognized, as the present occupant of the chair understands, for 20 minutes, 15 minutes on the original proposition and 5 minutes on the proposed substitute, but that exhausts his time.

Mr. KIRBY. I did not so understand it. I am glad to know that. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Arkansas that it is necessary, I think, to state the circumstances under which that proposition was offered at the time.

Mr. KIRBY. I was intending to do that, but the Senator may state it, if he likes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is necessary to an understanding of that proposition.

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator will state it as he understands it, then.

Mr. SIMMONS. That proposition was made shortly after the bipartisan conference had started its meetings. It was understood that in that conference there had been a tentative agreement upon all the other reservations embraced in the resolution of ratification except that as to the Monroe doctrine and that as to article 10, but as to those two there were still differences among the members of the bipartisan conference which had not been reconciled. It was for the purpose of showing the other side of the Chamber our attitude with reference to this particular reservation, around which all the differences that then existed centered. I think the agreement the Senator has read was only intended to apply to article 10.

Mr. KIRBY. That is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I think it was understood that if the other agreements which had been reached in the bipartisan conferences were carried out and article 10 was amended by the adoption of either of the two substitutes referred to in the agreement, then we would probably all vote for the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. KIRBY. My own view of the agreement was that there was an understanding among the Senators about such as stated by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. There seemed to be under the circumstances a possibility that the treaty might be ratified if the Senate could get together on a reservation to article 10. It seemed to be further understood that there must be, or necessarily would be, some kind of a reservation that must be agreed to, because for six or eight months we had fought the matter out and had not been able to ratify the treaty without some reservations.

It was only the purpose of the Senators in signing this agreement to show a disposition to compromise and get the treaty out of the way, to leave the treaty valid and effective for all purposes, as much so as could be done, but that it might be settled and disposed of. They agreed further in this writing that in case this first substitute as proposed by me was not consented to in a compromise by the other side and could not be adopted in the Senate the alternative proposition was the following reservation:

> The United States declines to assume any legal or binding obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10 or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose; but the Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power in the premises, will consider and decide what moral obligation, if any, under the circumstances of any particular case, when it arises, should move the United States in the interest of world peace and justice to take action therein, and will provide accordingly.

The people of the world are interested in this matter we are discussing here to-day. They have been interested since hostilities ceased more than a year ago. The people of the United States are vitally interested in the final disposition of the peace treaty and in knowing what the United States will do. Our representatives have agreed to the treaty as drawn, to the treaty as presented here, as all that ought to have been or was expected to be in the treaty could not be included. Our great President was there, and he insisted as one of the 14 points, the basis of settlement, that the freedom of the seas must be guaranteed in the settlement of this Great War. When he got to the conference he found that it could not be done. He insisted that secret treaties must be discouraged, and that they should not be respected or carried out in future; but when our representatives got to the peace conference they found that there had been a secret treaty between England, France, and Japan, and that that secret treaty had been performed and carried out so far as Japan was concerned, so that it was determined that it must be carried out and recognized in the provisions of the treaty in its relation to Shantung, and that was done.

This was the best treaty and settlement that could be effected, as we understand. Now, we are trying to fight it out; trying to settle what is the best that the United States Senate can do in the way of advising and consenting to this treaty.

Forty Democrats have agreed on this side by way of compromise to support the first reservation or the second reservation, both of which have been read. I wish to say here and now that there is not 15 cents difference between the last reservation as proposed by the Senator from Massachusets [Mr. LODGE] and the reservation as proposed by the representatives of the Democratic side on the bipartisan conference and the last reservation which I have read. There is not 15 cents difference in their practical application and meaning so far as carrying them out and executing them under the provisions of the peace treaty are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to say that I would have added my name to the Senators whom he mentions, making 41 for the first reservation which he has just presented; but I objected to the alternative reservation of President Taft because I did not feel sure it relieved us of the moral obligation at all.

Mr. KIRBY. That is the condition which actually exists in the Senate. Forty Democratic Senators have agreed to support the reservation which I have proposed as a substitute. There would have been 41 under the circumstances just related by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. On the other side, we know how many Senators over there have agreed to vote for the ratification of the treaty. We know what they have in mind and what they have expressed upon the floor as to the terms of the reservation which they are now insisting shall be included. That is the condition.

It seems to me that under those circumstances we ought to be able to get 64 Senators who will agree to the ratification of the treaty. Why, then, can it not be done? As I have said, in practical application and effect there is not 15 cents difference between the three reservations as proposed here. That is my judgment about the matter, after looking into it very carefully. It seems, then, to me that the treaty ought to be ratified under the circumstances. The war has been fought and won; the armistice has been signed; hostilities have ceased. The treaty with the covenant for the League of Nations is proposed here in the United States Senate. It embodies the greatest dream for the establishment of permanent peace since the Master came into the world, heralded by the angel chorus of "Peace on earth, good will to men." The greatest statesmen of the world met in Paris and fashioned this agreement and have thought it was not hopeless of substantial fulfillment. Our own representative and the representatives of all the other nations who were our associates and allies in the Great War have signed the treaty and it has been ratified by those nations in accordance with the agreement of their representatives.

Our own representative has brought it to us and said, "This is the best that I could do; this is the best that could be done." Now, the treaty is in the Senate, and I think the time has fully come, under the conditions existing, when we ought to be able to say, "This is the best that can be done toward advising and consenting to this treaty of peace."

If 40 Senators will agree to it on this side, then I believe Senators on the other side should do so. I am not questioning that a Senator on the Republican side of the aisle has not as much authority to represent the people of his own State and the people of the United States as has a Democratic Senator on this side of the aisle; nor questioning that he is charged with a like responsibility for his action here. I hope we can get together on this matter; I hope this reservation as proposed by me may be voted on and may be adopted. If it can not be adopted, then it seems to me, as there is no great difference in practical application between the three propositions, we ought to get together and ratify the treaty without further delay.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understood the Senator from Arkansas correctly, but what I did understand was that the reservation which he has offered to be voted on at this time is the one that was before the bipartisan conference?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; I so understand.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is mistaken as to that. The reservation which he now offers is not the one which was submitted for discussion to the bipartisan conference. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the reservation submitted for discussion before the bipartisan conference the following words were included:

or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not—

Those words, which are manifestly very important, are not in the reservation proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Furthermore, the first part of the reservation has been transposed. I know the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] said the next day or two when he published it in the newspapers that the reservation which he published was the one before the bipartisan conference. In that he also was mistaken. I will read the one which was before that conference.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KELLOGG. I only wish to take five minutes, but I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin is in some confusion in connection with the matter that was discussed in the bipartisan conference as to the position of the minority members of that conference. The words which he now quotes were in the Lodge reservation, and the rock upon which we split in the bipartisan conference was the proposition made by the minority members of that body to eliminate the words which the Senator has just read—"or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not."

When that proposition was made I understood that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] were inclined to favor the elimination of those words, but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] would not agree to their elimination, and a controversy arose among those three Republican Senators. As the result of that controversy they went out and held a conference. We did not come to an agreement as to the elimination of those words, but I thought—and I think it was the impression of all—that we would probably be able to come to an agreement at the next meeting. However, another meeting was never held.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the point I wish to make is that the reservation proposed for discussion was not the one now offered. It is true that we did discuss the subject of eliminating those words, but they were in the reservation proposed for discussion, and the Republican members of the conference withdrew to discuss that question when we adjourned for the evening.

The Senator is entirely mistaken, I think, when he says that the Senator from Wisconsin and myself favored it. We did not express any opinion of it; we went in to discuss it with the other members of the conference. There has been a transposition in another place in the reservation. I present the reservation that was before the bipartisan conference and ask to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve by its military or naval forces or by the economic boycott the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war, shall, by act or joint resolution, so provide.

Nothing herein shall be deemed to impair the obligation of article 16 concerning the economic boycott.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. KING. Has that been offered heretofore or printed?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; and it is not offered now. I simply asked to have it printed in the RECORD. It is the only copy I have.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator intend to offer it as a substitute?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, to the amendment as modified proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 2.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, my attention was diverted, and I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he called to the attention of the Senate the fact that there is another change from the bipartisan conference proposition in addition to the one relating to controversies between nations? The proposal before the bipartisan conference assumed "no obligation to preserve," while as now offered it reads "no obligation to employ." I think that any fair construction of the reservation now offered leaves the full obligation upon the part of Congress to do whatever is necessary to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member against external aggression.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if it is not a fact that, while we did not come to a positive agreement, there was a tentative understanding between us that the word "employ" should be substituted for the word "preserve" at that point, and the word "preserve" transposed to another part of the reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. No; quite to the contrary, the proposition came to us as it now reads; but it was tentatively agreed, as the original memorandum sent to the desk by the Senator from Minnesota shows, that certain words were to be transposed so that it should read "No obligation to preserve by" the use of the means set forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will not dispute the fact that when we were considering this reservation as embodied in the statement sent to the desk by the Senator from Minnesota the proposition was made by members of the minority at that conference to insert the word "employ" in the place of the word "preserve"?

Mr. LENROOT. That was the original proposal of the Democratic members.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. And, then, finally, after much discussion, the Senator from Minnesota had typewritten copies made of the proposition as we understood the Democratic members were willing to present it, and there, as is indicated, the language was transposed so as to read that there should be no obligation to "preserve" by use of the means named.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator if he and the Senator from Minnesota did not in a tentative way agree to that transposition?

Mr. LENROOT. Back "to preserve" but not "to employ"—certainly not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood them to agree to the transposition striking out the word "preserve," where it first appears, and inserting "employ," and then placing the word "preserve" immediately before the clause that relates to territorial integrity.

Mr. LENROOT. That is where the Democratic members of the conference wished to have it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. But I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina what, in his judgment, is the difference in the obligation by the transposition of those words?

Mr. SIMMONS. I had an idea that there was a very considerable difference.

Mr. LENROOT. I thought so. Did not the Senator think that it left the obligation complete upon Congress as he desired to have the reservation read?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from North Carolina will state frankly that he did believe that it left the obligation, but it provided that the obligation should not be enforced by certain means and instrumentalities except with the consent of Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. But the obligation would rest upon Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay." I will permit this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent on account of illness. Being unable to get a transfer, I shall have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family, and I have agreed to pair with him for the day. I find, however, that I can transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and I do so and will vote. I vote "nay." I will allow this announcement with reference to the pair and its transfer to stand for the day.

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina], I desire to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a pair, is absent and ill. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is absent on official business of the Senate. If he were present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. KIRBY's amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to Mr. LODGE's amendment as modified to reservation No. 2 was rejected.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I now offer as a substitute the second proposal of compromise, with the assent and agreement of 40 Democratic Senators. This is the reservation that ex-President Taft has insisted would take care of and preserve the interests of the United States, and the same 40 Senators agreed to vote for and support it by way of a compromise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. As a substitute for reservation No. 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

The United States declines to assume any legal or binding obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country under the provisions of article 10 or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose; but the Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power in the premises, will consider and decide what moral obligation, if any, under the circumstances of any particular case, when it arises, should move the United States in the interest of world peace and justice to take action therein and will provide accordingly.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it occurs to me that under the provisions of this treaty and this amendment there is no way of enforcing the guaranty to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity of the other nations of the world except, in the last analysis, by employing our military force, our Army and our Navy, or the economic boycott, as provided in the treaty. This amendment, proposed as a substitute, provides that such forces can not be employed under any circumstances or conditions except with the consent of Congress first obtained. Then, in its practical application and effect, what difference does it make? In one case we say that the United States agrees to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity of these nations, which can not be done except by employing our military and economic power. If this reservation is adopted, we say we agree to do it with the armed forces, the Navy and the Army, and with the economic boycott, only when Congress shall provide therefor, and not otherwise.

It seems to me that it would provide certainly a sufficient protection for us. That would furnish protection against sending our armies across the sea to enforce conditions and to take care of disputes that might not otherwise concern us, but for this agreement in article 10. It would be left to Congress in the last analysis where it was left in the first instance, because no power exists in this country to declare war or to bind us to prosecute war unless Congress shall do it under the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, when a man gives a promissory note to pay $100 in 30 days after date, everybody knows that that promissory note can not be enforced except through the instrumentality of the courts; but if the man were to give the promissory note, saying "Thirty days after date I promise to pay A. B. $100, but it is distinctly understood that the obligation of this note can not be enforced except through the operation of the courts," I imagine that nobody would like to take the note. The reference in the note to the instrumentality of collection would be at once unnecessary forthwith and discreditable to the promissor.

This reservation reminds me of just that sort of a transaction. Everybody knows that the constitutional instrumentalities of the country must be invoked in order to carry out the obligation assumed under article 10; but to put into the body of the article the recital of all the instrumentalities necessary to be invoked is just like the promissory-note case that I have supposed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether, under his construction of this reservation, there would be any moral obligation upon the United States or Congress remaining to preserve the territorial integrity of political independence of the other members of the league?

Mr. KIRBY. My understanding is that by this reservation Congress retains the right to determine whether or not there is any obligation at all to do it. It reserves the right to determine not only the obligation to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity, but the necessity for so doing, and the means to be used therefor.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, I should like to ask the Senator whether he has any doubt but that article 10 does impose a moral obligation?

Mr. KIRBY. Article 10 is a plain agreement to guarantee the political independence and territorial integrity of these other nations, and we would be bound at least to insist that the Congress would send our armies across the sea to carry out that agreement, if there is no reservation provided here.

Mr. LENROOT. Would not any Congress be compelled to construe the obligation the same as the Senator from Arkansas now construes it?

Mr. KIRBY. Without a reservation, it would seem that there is no other construction for Congress to place upon it.

Mr. LENROOT. With the reservation?

Mr. KIRBY. Without the reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. But with the reservation?

Mr. KIRBY. No. Under this proposal Congress has a right to determine whether there is an obligation or not, and also whether there is necessity for employing the armed forces to enforce it.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator says there is an obligation, would not any Congress be compelled to come to the same conclusion?

Mr. KIRBY. There would be an obligation if there were no reservation to article 10 as proposed in the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator says that under the reservation Congress simply determines whether there is an obligation under article 10.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes. This leaves it to the power of Congress to determine that question.

Mr. LENROOT. If there is an obligation under article 10, it remains upon Congress.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; but this leaves to the particular Congress, after the trouble arises, the right to say whether there is an obligation, and what means shall be employed for carrying it out.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator believe that any Congress would be less intelligent than he when he admits there is an obligation?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know what future Congresses will develop, but I hope they will be fully as intelligent as the present one.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, of course, there would be the obligation, would there not?

Mr. KIRBY. There would be the question of determining whether there was an obligation under the reservation as proposed. We say to the people over there: "We do not guarantee unreservedly to protect your interests; we do not guarantee unreservedly to send our Army and our Navy over there; but in a case that may develop we leave it to our Congress to determine whether we are bound to do this thing; and, if we are, to carry it out in its own proper way."

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator admits that we are bound?

Mr. KIRBY. We would be without a reservation, unquestionably.

Mr. LENROOT. And Congress would be compelled to come to the same conclusion, would it not?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know what Congress might do, but I do not think under this reservation as proposed that it would. It has the right to determine not only the obligation but the necessity for carrying it out.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the language is:

> But the Congress * * * will consider and decide what moral obligation, if any, under the circumstances of any particular case.

So that each case would stand on its own merit, and Congress would decide it when each case arose.

Mr. KIRBY. It would have the right to decide it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. KIRBY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). With the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). Making the same announcement as before, as to the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I will state that if he were present and not paired he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], to whom I transferred my pair before, is now in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG. The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to announce that my colleague, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], is absent on business of the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. KIRBY'S substitute for Mr. LODGE'S substitute for the reservation reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the pending reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the substitute.

The proposed substitute was read, as follows:

> The United States understands that by article 10 the United States undertakes separately to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of each other member of the league; but that article 10 does not impose upon the United States the separate, sole, and singular duty to preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every member of the league as against the external aggression of the other powers; but only that in case of such aggression or threat of the same, the council will advise upon the means for preserving the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the member against which such aggression is exerted, and will recommend to members of the league the measures which it may deem proper and necessary to protect the covenants of the league, and that the United States may consider such recommendations and take such action as Congress may in its discretion deem appropriate in such case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I propose a substitute for the pending reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The substitute proposed by Mr. SIMMONS was read, as follows:

> The United States agrees to use its friendly offices, when requested so to do under the provisions of article 10, in assisting to procure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations, or to protect any member of the league from external aggression; but it does not assume any obligation to use its military or naval forces, or its financial or economic resources for the purpose of intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations, or to protect the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation under the provisions of article 10, unless in any particular case the Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action and in the light of full information as to the national justice and human rights involved, shall by act or joint resolution so provide. Nothing herein shall be deemed to impair the obligations of the United States under article 16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the subsitute proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into any discussion with reference to this proposed substitute. It must be evident that there is a determination upon the part of the majority membership of this body to defeat any substitute or any amendment to the original reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I suppose this reservation will suffer the fate of the Taft reservation so-called and of the so-called minority conference committee reservation. But it differs from either of those and in some particulars it differs from any other substitute that has been offered. Yet, I believe that this substitute is drawn along proper and sane lines, and in saying that I wish to say that it was not originally drawn by myself.

I do not see how Senators on the other side of the Chamber, I do not see how any Senator in this body, could object to the United States agreeing affirmatively that it will, when requested to do so under article 10 of the treaty, exert its friendly offices to the end of securing a peaceful adjustment of a controversy coming under the application of the article. So I do not think there can be any objection to the first paragraph of the reservation.

With reference to the second paragraph, the controversy that has sprung up between this side of the Chamber and the other side of the Chamber relates very largely to that phrase in the Lodge reservation which declares that the United States assumes no obligation to interfere in controversies between other nations. This reservation meets that proposition with the positive statement that we do not assume any obligation to use our Army or our Navy, the economic boycott, or any of our economic or financial resources for the purpose of interfering in controversies between other nations. That question is met to that extent, that we may not interfere under this reservation in any controversy between two nations, members of the league, or in any controversy between nations by the use of our Army or Navy, our financial and economic resources, or by the application of the boycott.

It seems to me that is a reasonable way in which to meet this controversy, leaving interference in such controversies only to the friendly offices of this Government, to the exertion of its diplomatic resources in order to bring about peace and an adjustment of these difficulties.

Then it proceeds with the broad declaration that the United States assumes no obligation whatever to preserve the territorial integrity or the political independence of any other country by the use of its Army, its Navy, its financial or economic resources or by the application of the boycott. Every fundamental objection that has been urged by Senators on the other side to this article of the treaty is met in this reservation, and every interest which they said would be jeopardized by its enactment has been met in this reservation. I can not see why men who want the treaty to be ratified, even with proper, as they claim, safeguards for the United States, can not agree upon this reservation.

You gentlemen on that side have said that this article of the treaty leaves unguarded the interests of the United States. Your main and fundamental objection to it was that we would have to send our boys to fight the battles of the world. Under this proposed reservation this particular obligation is eliminated.

Then you said there were other controversies in addition to this that must grow out of the question of preserving the territorial integrity and political independence, which you wished protected. You did not wish the United States to intercede by the use of its Army, by the use of the boycott, by the use of its financial resources, by the use of its economic resources. You did not wish it to interfere with any sort of controversy between other nations. The reservation which I have offered here meets that objection, and says that just as in other cases, of questions of territorial integrity and political independence or any other sort of case and situation that may arise in connection with the quarrels and disputes of other countries, that the United States assumes no obligation in that case, as well as in the case of territorial questions, no obligation to use its Army, Navy, or other instrumentalities of force and coercion.

I do not know whether any reservation could be presented here that changes even so much as by a word the Lodge reservation, in the situation which now exists, could receive the votes of the mild reservationists upon the other side. I do not exactly understand the situation on that side. I understand there are 12 or 14 Senators on that side of the Chamber who are not willing to vote for the treaty under any circumstances or conditions. For the past eight months upon the floor of the Senate and everywhere else where they could exert influence, these Senators have sought to bring about the total defeat of the treaty, without reference to modifications, without reference to changes. Openly and aboveboard they have declared that they did not approve of one single proposition in it and that they would not stand for it, it making no difference to them whether it should be changed or unchanged. We have been led to believe that there are Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and that they are in the majority, overwhelmingly in the majority, who are exceedingly solicitous about the ratification of the treaty, who believe that the interests of the United States require that it should be ratified, who believe that the interests of the world require that it should be ratified, who believe that it touches the humanities of the world, and that those humanities appeal to us that it shall be ratified. And yet, Mr. President, those Senators representing the majority on the other side seem to be bound by some sort of arrangement over there by which they are unable to vote for even a satisfactory change in an article of this treaty to which they have objection, unless they can get the consent of the 15 irreconcilables.

Of course, we can not get a two-thirds vote for the treaty, it goes without saying, if the majority on the other side who believe in the treaty and who want it ratified as we want it ratified are so bound to the minority on that side that they can vote for nothing which the minority does not approve, because every man of common sense in this body and in the country knows that the minority on that side will not approve of any change that affects in the slightest the substance of this reservation or of the other reservations that are in controversy.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Can the Senator give us any assurance that the treaty, with the proposition which he is advocating, will finally receive the approbation of the Executive?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not give the Senator any assurance as to the attitude of the Executive of this country with reference to this treaty—but I do say that, in my judgment—and I would not have said that much about the other two reservations we have just voted upon—if the reservation which I have offered shall be adopted it will receive the approval of the Chief Executive of this country.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a further question? Does the Senator expect that it will be supported with any unanimity on his side of the Chamber?

Mr. SIMMONS. I expect that this proposed reservation will receive at least 41 votes on this side of the Chamber. Now, Senators on that side of the Chamber who want to see the treaty ratified, who in their heart of hearts believe that it ought to be ratified—and I know the majority of you do—I invite you to join with us. You have 30 votes on that side of Senators who believe in the treaty as much as I believe in it, and I know it; of men who believe that it is in the interest of this country that the treaty should be ratified; of men who believe that it is in the interests of the world that the treaty should be ratified; and now I ask you 30 gentlemen to join us, and if you 30 Senators will joint us I am quite sure we can get enough votes over here to put this reservation over; and if this reservation goes over, I am quite sure that the treaty will be ratified by the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am quite sure that the 30 Republicans to whom the Senator from North Carolina has made his seductive appeal will put their heads right in the noose.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if, in the spirit of his substitute and the spirit of his address in support of it, he will accept an amendment on line 11, after the words "article 10," to insert the words "or any other article of the treaty"? That certainly carries out the spirit of the substitute and of the argument which the Senator from North Carolina made in support of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator withhold that a moment? I will give him an answer in a very few moments.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I can well imagine that the President of the United States might be perfectly satisfied to accept the proposition which has been presented by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], because the President of the United States has written to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] stating that he would not accept any proposition which did not contain the obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the other members of the league as prescribed in article 10. Therefore the compromise tendered by the Senator from North Carolina will undoubtedly be quite acceptable to the President, because under the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina the obligation of article 10 in the treaty is not repudiated by the reservation. There it stands in the treaty, that we, as a member of the league, undertake to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every member of the league as against external aggression. In this proposal the Senator from North Carolina does not repudiate that obligation. Let me read it:

The United States agrees to use its friendly offices, when requested so to do under the provisions of article 10—

Under the provisions of article 10—

in assisting to procure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations, or to protect any member of the league from external aggression—

It assumes that obligation—

but it does not assume any obligation to use its military or naval forces, or its financial or economic resources, for the purpose of intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations—

That simply states what means it does not propose to use in carrying out the obligation which is imposed by the treaty and not denied by the reservation—

but it does not assume any obligation to use its military or naval forces, or its financial or economic resources, for the purpose of intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations or to protect the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation under the provisions of article 10, unless in any particular case the Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action and in the light of full information as to the national justice and human rights involved, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Mr. President, of course, without any reservation at all, Congress can at any time in the future, in the light of the situation, assume any attitude it wants to and any obligation it wants to in order to simply go ahead and do something. If this treaty should be defeated, the Congress would not, if a new war should break out, assume any obligation under article 10, because the treaty would not be in operation; but it could make any agreement it desired with the other nations and act with them, just as we did in the German war, without any treaty whatever.

However, what I want to emphasize is that this proposal is skillfully and ingeniously drafted to abstain from repudiating the obligation which has been imposed upon us under the treaty by article 10. If we ratify the treaty, there it stands in the treaty. All we do under this ingenious and deftly prepared set of words is to tender our friendly offices in case of future trouble and to say that we will not use our Army and Navy and our financial resources in intervening in controversies or conflicts between nations; but the obligation rests upon us, accepted by the ratification of the treaty, to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every member of the league. In other words, this is an adroit subterfuge which accepts the obligation in the treaty by not denying it, and, of course, it would be greedily and happily accepted by the President of the United States, and the whole contention over article 10 which has been made here for 15 months would be abandoned by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment as modified in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to reservation No. 2.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether in his construction of his proposed substitute there is any difference in the obligations reserved under his proposal and the Lodge modification except the obligation to use our good offices?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I think there is a difference.

Mr. LENROOT. What other obligation remains under the Senator's reservation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think that part of the reservation which relates to controversies between other nations is at all like the Lodge reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but may I ask the Senator what obligation under article 10 will remain if his substitute is adopted?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think if the substitute is adopted its practical effect would be that the United States would assume no obligation either with respect to the preservation of territorial integrity or as to political independence of other nations except when Congress acts, and in that part of it there would not be any material difference between my substitute and the Lodge reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, Mr. President, taking the construction of the Senator from North Carolina, we have this situation, that in his view there is no difference between the Lodge reservation and his in substance, but that 41 Democrats will vote for his reservation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin misrepresents me.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not intend to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator was talking about only one part of the reservation. The Senator was eliminating the first part of the reservation. I think the Lodge reservation eliminates the first part of my reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. In regard to using our good offices?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, that is the only difference?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the substantial difference—as to the obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations.

Mr. LENROOT. Are we, then, to understand that the President of the United States, in the opinion of the Senator from North Carolina, would exchange ratifications of the treaty if his substitute is adopted when the only distinction between the two is the obligation to use our good offices in one case and not in the other?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, the Senator does not state my first qualification. My first qualification as to the difference between my substitute and the Lodge reservation was with reference to the use of the words "intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations."

Mr. LENROOT. Under article 10.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Lodge reservation does not permit our interference in controversies between other nations under any circumstances whatever without consent of Congress. My reservation provides that we shall not use our Army or Navy or economic resources to interfere with those controversies without consent of Congress. The Lodge reservation excludes all kinds of interference, while mine excludes the use of certain agencies except with consent of Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, as I now understand the Senator from North Carolina, the obligation to preserve territorial integrity is left intact, except that we do not agree to use certain means for the purpose of protecting it? Is that correct?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not follow the Senator in all of his statement, but the reservation provides that we do not assume any obligation to protect the territorial integrity, and so forth, by the use of our Army, and so on, unless Congress so provides. It makes the same provision with reference to controversies between nations. The Lodge reservation does not make that same condition to the obligation with reference to controversies between nations as to that imposed with reference to territory and independence.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, but it does. The Lodge reservation provides that we shall not interfere in controversies between nations unless the Congress shall so provide.

Mr. SIMMONS. But my proposed substitute says we shall not interfere in them by the use of our Army and Navy without the action of Congress. The Lodge reservation says we shall not interfere with them at all. There is a very substantial difference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LENROOT. If I have any time left, I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator allow me to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question in his time?

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. I wish, however, only to use my five minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether he claims his reservation repudiates the obligation contained in the treaty to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity of the other members of the league?

Mr. SIMMONS. Repudiates it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; the obligation, not the means of enforcing the obligation. Does the Senator claim that it repudiates the obligation?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means the proposition submitted by me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It repudiates it to the extent that we are not to use or employ our Army and Navy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is simply a statement of what means we are not to use in enforcing the obligation. Does it repudiate the obligation?

Mr. SIMMONS. It says that the United States shall not be under any obligation——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To use its military forces.

Mr. SIMMONS. To use its Army and Navy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does it say that we shall not be under any obligation to protect the integrity, politically or otherwise, of members of the league?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has spoken once.

Mr. SIMMONS. It says that we shall not be under any obligation to do so by the use of certain instrumentalities.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But it leaves the obligation otherwise intact?

Mr. SIMMONS. It leaves the obligation in part intact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has spoken once upon the question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, we are speaking in the time of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, it is with some amusement that I have listened to this discussion to-day, recalling that only three or four days since I was rebuked for suggesting that, like medieval theologians, we were debating how many angels might dance on the point of a needle. This is a metaphysical and legalistic discussion, in my humble judgment, which makes the Senate of the United States ridiculous before the people of this country. Let us have done with it, and vote the reservation up or down.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment as modified in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 2.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina. I ask the Senator from North Carolina whether he will accept it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will accept it if the Senator will add to it the words "except article 16." I am afraid that the language which the Senator wishes to inject into the amendment might possibly interfere with the free exercise of our obligations under article 16.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would not accept that condition; on the contrary, I should like to have it expressed that we are not bound by article 16.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that was the purpose of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should certainly like it to have that effect. I offer the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I would accept that amendment, provided, as I have said, the Senator would make it clear that it is not intended to nullify article 16. Article 16 of the treaty is one upon which I thought we were all substantially agreed, and that nobody wished to weaken it, and certainly nobody wished to nullify it. I am very much afraid that that would be the effect of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not accept the condition. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the numeral "10," where it occurs the second time in the proposed reservation, Mr. SHIELDS proposes to add the words "or any other article of the treaty," so as to read:

The United States agrees to use its friendly offices, when requested so to do under the provisions of article 10, in assisting to procure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations, or to protect any member of the league from external aggression; but it does not assume any obligation to use its military or naval forces or its financial or economic resources for the purpose of intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations, or to protect the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation under the provisions of article 10 or any other article of the treaty, unless in any particular case the Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action and in the light of full information as to the national justice and human rights involved, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. REED and Mr. SMOOT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah will state it.

Mr. KING. Is the vote being taken now upon the reservation offered by the Senator from North Carolina or upon the amendment thereto offered by the Senator from Tennessee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote is being taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee to the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when Mr. NELSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. NELSON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and not being able to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I desire to state that if present he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness. I am therefore not at liberty to vote and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—22.

So Mr. SHIELDS's amendment to Mr. SIMMONS's substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. BORAH. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the substitute may be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] the following is offered:

2. The United States agrees to use its friendly offices, when requested so to do, under the provisions of article 10, in assisting to procure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations, or to protect any member of the league from external aggression; but it does not assume any obligation to use its military or naval forces or its financial or economic resources for the purpose of intervention in the controversies or conflicts between nations, or to protect the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation under the provisions of article 10, unless in any particular case the Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action and in the light of full information as to the national justice and human rights involved, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho requests the yeas and nays upon the substitute. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which I think will clarify this reservation. I move to insert after the words "The United States" the following: "does not assume any obligation under article 10, but will," and to strike out the words "agrees to," so that it will read:

The United States does not assume any obligation under article 10, but will use its friendly offices, when requested so to do, under the provisions of article 10, in assisting to prccure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations. It assumes no obligation to protect any member of the league from external aggression, or to use its military or naval forces or its financial or economic resources with reference to intervention in controversies or conflicts of nations.

Mr. President, in view of the several changes I have had to make hastily while reading the amendment, I offer the matter which I send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina the following is proposed:

The United States does not assume any obligation under article 10, but will use its friendly offices, when requested so to do, under the provisions of article 10, in assisting to procure a just and peaceful settlement of territorial or political controversies between nations.

Mr. REED. I desire to offer it just to the point read, and let it stand at that. I offer it as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say that the substitute as now offered presents the case exactly as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] presented it. He assured us in a very interesting speech that about all that was left was the obligation to use our good offices. I am quite willing that we should do that. Therefore I have offered this substitute in order to make perfectly clear, in legislative form, what the Senator from North Carolina proposed in his speech. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am not at liberty to vote, because I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness. I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to announce that my colleague, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Making the same announcement as to the absence of my pair as before and being unable to get a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

YEAS—18.

So Mr. REED'S substitute for Mr. SIMMONS'S substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment by way of a substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). On account of my pair, I must withhold my vote. If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair from the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I desire to make the same announcement regarding my pair as before. On account of the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am not at liberty to vote, because the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have a pair, is absent on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 51, as follows:

So Mr. SIMMONS'S substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I move to strike from the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts the following words found in lines 6 and 7 of the printed copy thereof, namely, "including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence." This is, to my mind, simply absurd tautology, and I must confess some surprise that such a master of English as the Senator from Massachusetts should have the thought of marring the reservation tendered by him by the introduction of this language. The original draft read:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations.

The reservation provided that the United States would not interfere in controversies between nations, and there is no limitation on the controversies at all—all the controversies; any controversy. It certainly does not improve the situation to add "including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence." We ought to have some pride at least in the form of the proposed substitute.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is plain enough to be understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Secretary to state it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] proposes to strike from the substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts the words "including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence," and the comma.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement regarding the absence of my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am not at liberty to vote, owing to the absence of my pair. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. Announcing my pair as before and being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GAY] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

YEAS—35.

Ashurst	Harrison	Myers	Simmons
Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Ga.

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana to Mr. LODGE's substitute was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in the course of some remarks made on the 6th day of last November by the distinguished junior Senator from the State of Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], he declared that a policy ought to be announced, expressed in the following language:

If a situation should arise in which any power should, directly or indirectly, menace the freedom and peace of Europe, the United States would regard such situation with grave concern as a menace to its own freedom and peace, and would consult with other powers affected, with a view to concerted action for the removal of such menace.

The Senator on that occasion asserted that—declared or not, the above is the approved policy of America.

It seems to me this is the most opportune time and the present the most appropriate occasion for the declaration of that policy thus declared to be the policy of the United States. Accordingly, I offer the following amendment to be added to the substitute tendered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add, at the end of the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the following words:

Any act or threat of external aggression involving the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation, whether a member of the league or not, which, in the judgment of the United States, menaces or threatens the peace of the world, will be a matter of grave concern to the United States, and assurance is hereby given that the United States will seek to cooperate, entirely within the powers conferred by the Constitution, with the other members of the league to the end that such menace or threat to the peace of the world be removed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Montana has offered this as an expression of the view expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania on the 6th of last November?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Montana endeavored to paraphrase the extract from the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania which he read.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not as successful at paraphrasing as he is at tautology.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before voting on it I should like to see the substance of the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania of which this is a paraphrase.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to furnish the Senator with the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to see it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will find it at page 8000.

[The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was handed to Mr. LODGE.]

Mr. LODGE. The resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania reads:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States unreservedly advises and consents to the ratification of this treaty in so far as it provides for the creation of a status of peace between the United States and Germany.

I did not observe that in the Senator's paraphrase.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to inform the Senator from Massachusetts that I did not assert that it was a paraphrase of any resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I declared that, in the course of a speech delivered, he had made this declaration.

Mr. LODGE. It is a paraphrase of his speech. I thought it was intended to be a paraphrase of the resolution to which the speech related.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will read to the Senator the extract from the speech to which I referred and which he will find in the RECORD before him. The Senator from Pennsylvania on that occasion said we should declare the following policy:

If a situation should arise in which any power should, directly or indirectly, menace the freedom and peace of Europe, the United States would regard such situation with grave concern as a menace to its own freedom and peace, and would consult with other powers affected, with a view to concerted action for the removal of such menace.

Mr. LODGE. That is what the Senator's amendment covers?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; that is what it covers.

Mr. LODGE. It is not, then, a paraphrase; it is a quotation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I quoted the Senator's language and endeavored to put it in the form of an amendment to the pending substitute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have not before me the RECORD from which the Senator from Massachusetts has quoted. I assume, however, the reference was based upon section 5 of Senate resolution 76, which was reported favorably by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] from the Committee on Foreign Relations on June 12, 1919. I will say that as the resolution was reported section 5 was stricken out by the committee, but section 5, which the Senator from Pennsylvania embodied in the resolution and which I indorsed in several speeches made in the Senate from time to time as the proper attitude for this Government to assume under the circumstances and which was all that our allies or associates in the recent war ought to expect from us, in view of our peculiar situation, reads as follows:

5. That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

I said before, Mr. President, that I thought that was a proper, dignified, and almost necessary attitude for us to take in order to show the world that we were not trying to shirk any obligation to maintain peace in the world. I am ready to vote for it at any proper time. Whether it would be wise to attach it to this reservation to the treaty, I have not had time to consider, but, as at present advised, I see no objection to it.

It ought to be done anyway. The treaty may not be ratified by the Senate; ratifications may not be exchanged by the powers if it is ratified, and I am still in favor of the declaration, which I think would satisfy France even if they did not get the Franco-English treaty.

Before concluding I wish to state that the paraphrase, or whatever it may be called, offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] refers to our cooperating with the other members of the league. To that extent I would object to it, because we may not be a member of the league, but, with the declaration proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, we stand on our own basis.

Mr. LODGE. That is an entirely independent resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It sets forth an American policy just as the Monroe doctrine does.

Mr. LODGE. It sets forth an American policy, but here it is put in as an amendment to a reservation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, perhaps as the author of the suggestion proposed by the Senator from Montana, I may be able to throw some light upon its genesis, upon its purpose, and upon what I regard as might possibly have been its value in concluding the great World War.

My proposition of an American policy was first suggested before the President of the United States went abroad for the purpose of negotiating the pending treaty of peace. It was suggested in connection with the resolution which I offered on the 3d day of December, 1918, which resolution I ask the indulgence of the Senate to read. It is brief, and a reading of it is essential to a complete understanding of the proposition for which I then and subsequently and now contend. The resolution reads as follows:

Senate resolution 361.

Mr. KNOX submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Whereas the United States of America entered the war with Germany and Austria-Hungary in order to vindicate the ancient rights of navigation as established under international law and in order to remove forever the German menace to our peace; and

"Whereas the splendid effort of the American people and the valor of our soldiers and sailors during a year and a half, when added to the enormous sacrifices, the steadfast fortitude, and the noble courage displayed by our allies during more than four years, have made possible the attainment of those aims, now best expressed as restitution, reparation, and guaranties against the German menace; and

"Whereas the surrender of Germany and Austria-Hungary to the terms of the armistice has attained a great part and has rendered enforceable the remainder of those aims; and

"Whereas conferences are about to take place with the purpose to complete, to perfect, and to guarantee the attainment of the war aims aforesaid and thus to pass to the state of formal peace: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the purposes of the United States of America in those conferences should be confined to the aforesaid aims and matters germane thereto.

"Second. That for the safeguarding of those aims the first essential is a definite understanding that, the same necessity arising in the future, there shall be the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

"Third"—

And to this paragraph I desire to direct particular attention—

"Third. That any project for any general League of Nations or for any sweeping change in the ancient laws of the sea as hitherto recognized as international law and violated by the Teutonic powers should be postponed for separate consideration, not alone by the victorious belligerents but by all the nations if and when at some future time general conferences on those subjects might be deemed useful.

"Further resolved, That immediately upon compliance with the terms of the armistice and the guaranteed attainment of the war aims as aforesaid the Army and Navy of the United States should be withdrawn from foreign territories and waters except in so far as their retention might be temporarily necessary to establish the status contemplated by the armistice; and, further, that the extraordinary powers conferred upon the President for the prosecution of the war should be withdrawn and the country restored to a normal condition of peace with the greatest possible celerity consistent with the national interest."

Mr. President, nothing can be more obvious than that this suggested policy or this doctrine, as I characterized it in the address I made in support of my proposed resolution; nothing can be more obvious than that the suggestion of tacking this policy onto a League of Nations was foreign to the mind of the person who originated it. The proposed policy was to be a substitute for the League of Nations. The whole purpose of the resolution, Mr. President, was that the warring belligerents should come to an immediate peace. The theory upon which it was projected was that the termination of the state of belligerency was a matter for the warriors who had fought out the issues upon the field, and the question as to bringing the nations together into cooperation for the avoidance of future wars was one that appealed to a different type of mind, and should be postponed until the passions of war had quieted.

To-day, if we could wipe out the proposed League of Nations from the treaty, I would gladly support the declaration of such a policy. I think that the United States would without such a declaration, as it did in the past, go to the relief of civilization whenever seriously attacked, and it has always appeared to me, Mr. President, that this attempt to bind the United States by signatures, seals, covenants, protocols, and understandings in writing after the magnificent record that it has made in the last three years, seems like asking a man who has sold all he has and given it to the poor to give bond to be charitable for the future.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair suggest to the Senator from Montana that he has already spoken once upon this amendment and that the unanimous-consent agreement contemplates that a Senator shall speak but once.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment as modified in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 2.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana, if this amendment is adopted, whether he and his associates will vote for the reservation as amended or will vote to ratify the treaty with the reservation added?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not feel called upon to signify in advance what I propose to do with respect to something in the future. I do not propose to announce now what I shall do with reference to the resolution of ratification at some future time, but I will say to the Senator, so far as that is concerned, that I will vote for this reservation if it is amended.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if amendments are to be offered here to make ratification more difficult, instead of to expedite it, however meritorious an amendment might be if offered for the purpose of aiding ratification, I do not think it ought to be accepted unless we can have some assurance that the acceptance of the amendment will aid in securing a ratification of the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. The Senator from Wisconsin knows that I am very sincerely desirous of having this treaty ratified, and very sincerely desirous of putting these reservations in such shape that it will be ratified; but I inquire of him whether it is not necessary to count on some additional votes from this side as well as from the other side?

Mr. LENROOT. The purpose of my inquiry of the Senator was to ascertain what we could count upon over there if that were done. The Senator does not say, and I assume that he can not do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to try to help the Senator to get them, but I can not promise any votes to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I desire to make the same announcement regarding my pair, and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. Having a pair with the Senator from Wyoming, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—34.

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana to Mr. LODGE'S amendment, as modified, to reservation No. 2 was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the pending reservation the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the following is offered:

2. That the advice mentioned in article 10 of the covenant of the league which the council may give to the member nations as to the employment of their naval and military forces is merely advice, which each member nation is free to accept or reject according to the conscience and judgment of its then existing government; and in the United States this advice can only be accepted by action of the Congress at the time in being, Congress alone, under the Constitution of the United States, having the power to declare war.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if that is offered as an amendment to my modification, I can only say that it seems to me a needless thing and to produce nothing but confusion. If the Senator wants to have that added as another reservation, it can be done separately, but I hope it will not be put upon this one.

Mr. KING. I do not offer it as an amendment. I offer it as a substitute.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, as a substitute for my whole modification?

Mr. KING. For the reservation which the Senator from Massachusetts offers.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. KING. And I commend it unreservedly to the Senators upon the other side of the aisle.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, that is impossible. It absolutely destroys all value either in my first reservation or in the modified form.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it is also an attempt to amend the treaty for the other powers, because it defines their duties.

Mr. LODGE. It has numerous sides to it.

Mr. KING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as before, I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness. Having been unable to secure a transfer of my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to announce that my colleague, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent on business of the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Ashurst	Henderson	Myers	Sheppard
Beckham	Hitchcock	Nugent	Simmons
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Smith, Md.

So Mr. KING's substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRANCE. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The READING CLERK. At the close of the proposed reservation add:

It is understood that the United States does not in any sense or particular abandon or modify its doctrine that an obligation rests upon every advanced nation which has colonies, protectorates or dependencies to hold all such in wardship only as a trust and to adopt adequate measures for the elevation, education, training, and preparation of their peoples for self-determination and ultimate full participation as equals in the society of nations, and it is further understood that under no circumstances will the United States interfere to preserve the territorial integrity of any imperial country in any controversy growing out of the ambitions of a subject nation or colony to gain its independence, and it is further understood that the loaning by any external power of financial assistance to such subject nation or colony seeking its independence shall not be considered an act of external aggression, for the United States looks forward to the time when all of the ancient nations, such as Ireland, India, and Egypt, may attain that liberation and right of self-determination which they may desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair, and will have to withhold my vote, being unable to get a transfer.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Announcing once more my pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] and its transfer to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent on official business, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce the absence of my pair. Therefore I can not vote. If I were at liberty to vote upon this amendment, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). If I were at liberty to vote upon this amendment, I would vote "nay." I am, however, paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent from the city on account of illness, and I am not at liberty to vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] on business of the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 24, as follows:

So Mr. LODGE's amendment in the nature of a substitute for reservation No. 2 was agreed to.

Mr. REED subsequently said:

Mr. President, I desire to put in the RECORD an explanation. When the vote was taken on the substitute for the original Lodge reservation I voted for it, understanding that the original Lodge reservation had been withdrawn and that I had no option except to vote for that substitute. I therefore supported it. I was engaged in writing at the moment and did not know the exact form of the motion. Had I understood that an opportunity would be offered to vote against the substitute and then to support it if it was accepted, I should have voted otherwise than I did. My position was that I preferred the original Lodge reservation to the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon reservation No. 2, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, as amended by the substitute just adopted.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as before, I withhold my vote, being unable to secure a transfer.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague is absent on the business of the Senate.

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I make the same announcement as before with reference to my colleague and his pair. If he were present and were not paired, on this question he would vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Announcing once more my pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] and its transfer to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement regarding my pair as before. If I were at liberty to vote upon this question, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am not at liberty to vote, for the reason stated upon a preceding roll call. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Reported reservation No. 2, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not under the provisions of article 10 or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose unless in any particular case the Congress which under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States shall in the exercise of full liberty of action by act or joint resolution so provide.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that completes the reservations reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following interpretative reservation in regard to Egypt:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

Mr. President, article 147 of the peace treaty provides:

Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914. * * *

It is clear that the ratification of the treaty by the United States without reservation as to this article compelling Germany to recognize the protectorate would seem to mean the unqualified recognition by the United States of this so-called protectorate. The question is then what is this protectorate so recognized?

Without an interpretative definition of the word "protectorate" the ratification of article 147 would seem to mean that the United States would be assenting to the giving Great Britain a recognition as to Egypt for Great Britain to use as the British foreign office may desire. The United States should know what it is doing in ratifying the provision recognizing the protectorate. Would the recognition of this protectorate mean that the United States had become an accomplice to the destruction of self-determination of Egypt and to turning Egypt over to Great Britain? Or would it merely be a recognition of a war measure which was defined at the time it was proclaimed?

This reservation which I have offered gives the definition of the protectorate which was given by Great Britain at the time the protectorate was proclaimed. This reservation speaks only of the past, without attempting to bind Great Britain to any particular course in the future, or to determine the future status of Egypt. It leaves the United States free, while ratifying article 147 of section 6, to determine later what attitude it may take, if any, with respect to the status of Egypt. That the so-called protectorate at the time it was proclaimed was announced by the British Government as merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt is evidenced by documents on file at the State Department, and by the assurances given by King George V to the late Sultan of Egypt, as well as by pledges of British officials to Egyptian officials at the time.

In a statement filed with the United States Department of State by the British Government on December 18, 1914, when this so-called protectorate was proclaimed, the British Government gave as a reason that Turkey had attacked Egypt, and that it was necessary for Great Britain to assume the protection of Egypt during the war. The statement so filed by the British Government with the State Department reads:

In view of the state of war initiated by Turkey against Egypt His Majesty's Government consider that the suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt is terminated, and they have advised His Majesty to place Egypt under his protection and to order the adoption of all measures necessary for the safety of the inhabitants, the defense of the country, and the protection of the many and various important interests existing there. Official notifications to this effect have been issued in London and Cairo. * * *

On December 18, 1914, King George V of England, in order to assure the Egyptian people that the protectorate was merely to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt, said in a telegram to the late Sultan of Egypt, which was published in the London Times of December 21, 1914, as follows:

On the occasion, when Your Highness enters upon your high office, I desire to convey to Your Highness the expression of my most sincere friendship and the assurance of my unfailing support in safeguarding the integrity of Egypt and in securing her future well-being and prosperity.

Your Highness has been called upon to undertake the responsibilities of your high office at a grave crisis in the national life of Egypt, and I feel convinced that you will be able, with the cooperation of your ministers and the protection of Great Britain, to successfully overcome all the influences which are seeking to destroy the independence of Egypt and the wealth, liberty, and happiness of the people.

(Signed) GEORGE R. AND I.

To this the Sultan of Egypt replied:

I present to Your Majesty the expression of my deepest gratitude for the feelings of friendship with which you see fit to honor me, and for the assurance of your valuable support in safeguarding the integrity and independence of Egypt.

Rushdi Pasha, who was prime minister of Egypt at the time, stated that he only accepted this protectorate upon the solemn assurances by British officials that it was merely for the period of the war to protect Egypt during the war. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Oct. 30, 1919, at p. 7727.)

This so-called protectorate was qualifiedly recognized by the State Department, but the protectorate so recognized by the State Department was the temporary war-control protectorate defined by the British Government in the statement set out above, filed with the State Department. This is made clear in a letter to me from Secretary of State Lansing dated December 16, 1919. I had written Secretary Lansing, asking for a definition of the protectorate over Egypt, which was recognized. In his reply Secretary Lansing speaks of the "so-called protectorate," and says:

The effect of this Government's qualified recognition of April, 1919, was to acknowledge with the reservation set forth at that time only such control of Egyptian affairs as had been set forth in the notice of the British Government transmitted to the State Department on December 18, 1914, a copy of which is inclosed.

The notice referred to is quoted above and shows that the control of Egyptian affairs, so recognized by the State Department, was a war measure to protect the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war. In his letter to me Secretary Lansing further says:

It is assumed that it is the purpose of Great Britain to carry out the assurances given by King George the Fifth of England to the late Sultan of Egypt, as published in the London Times of December 21, 1914.

These assurances, as we have seen, were of the integrity and independence of Egypt. So that this recognition of the State Department was only of a limited war-time control of Egyptian affairs by Great Britain, owing to the fact that Turkey had attacked Egypt.

It can not be fairly contended, as some British officials do contend, that this recognition approved a permanent occupation of Egypt by Great Britain. On the contrary, it only qualifiedly approved a war-time measure of control, entirely different from the right of permanent occupation of Egypt that Great Britain now claims.

The word "protectorate," says the London Times, is a mysterious word. It can be made to mean anything. The ratification of article 147 without defining our understanding of the meaning of the word "protectorate" would apparently bind the United States to recognize any course of action Great Britain might take with respect to Egypt. The interpretative reservation which I present, if adopted, would show clearly what it is that the United States is approving, which is only that limited war-time control to which Secretary Lansing referred. Without this definition, the United States would appear to be lending its prestige to underwrite Great Britain's future course regarding Egypt, no matter what that course might be.

This matter has been put up to the United States by article 147 of the treaty, and the question is, Shall we approve this protectorate without knowing what it means and without expressing our understanding of what it means, or shall we give our understanding of the meaning of the word, based upon the statement of the British Government at the time it was proclaimed, the statement of King George V of England, and the pledges to the Egyptian officials by British officials?

In adopting this interpretative reservation, the United States would be attending strictly to its own business, for surely Great Britain can not ask the United States to approve blindly in advance anything that Great Britain might do in the future with respect to Egypt, or to approve a "protectorate" without the United States defining what it understands the word "protectorate" to mean.

Some Senators insist that the action of the Secretary of State is sufficient, but I think it would be better to have the Senate make a similar statement in language equally clear.

The letter of Secretary Lansing is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 16, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of November 29 last, in which you inquire as to the effect of this Government's recognition of the so-called protectorate proclaimed by Great Britain over Egypt on December 18, 1914.

In reply I beg to state that the department does not understand that Egypt was, prior to the British proclamation of December 18, 1914, in possession of full independent sovereign rights.

The effect of this Government's qualified recognition of April, 1919, was to acknowledge with the reservation set forth at that time only such control of Egyptian affairs as had been set forth in the notice of the British Government transmitted to the department on December 18, 1914, a copy of which is inclosed.

It is assumed that it is the purpose of Great Britain to carry out the assurances given by King George the Fifth of England to the late Sultan of Egypt, as published in the London Times of December 21, 1914.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant, ROBERT LANSING.

(Inclosure: As indicated.)

The inclosure is a letter from Cecil Spring-Rice, the ambassador of the British Empire to the United States, dated December 18, 1914, which is as follows:

(No. 434.)

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Washington, December 18, 1914.

SIR: I have the honor, under instructions from my Government, to communicate to you, sir, for your information, the accompanying copy of a telegram stating that His Majesty's Government consider that the suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt is terminated and that they have advised the King to place Egypt under his protection.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir,
Your most obedient humble servant,
CECIL SPRING RICE.

The Hon. W. J. BRYAN,
Secretary of State, etc.

You should communicate the following to Government to which you are accredited:

"In view of the state of war initiated by Turkey against Egypt, His Majesty's Government consider that the suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt is terminated, and they have advised His Majesty to place Egypt under his protection and to order the adoption of all measures necessary for the safety of the inhabitants, the defense of the country, and the protection of the many and various important interests existing there. Official notifications to this effect have been issued in London and Cairo. The unprovoked nature of the Turkish aggression has prevented any discussion of this matter with the powers beforehand, but His Majesty's Government have no intentions of impairing foreign interests and wish to act in harmony with the powers in making those changes affecting their interests which are rendered unavoidable by the aggression of Turkey.

"Meanwhile the Egyptian Government will arrange for the issue of a khedival decree providing that the consular and other foreign courts shall continue to exercise in Egypt their accustomed jurisdiction to the extent to which the arrangements which will have to be made by the military authorities for the maintenance of public order are not inconsistent therewith.

You should add that His Majesty's Government have appointed a high commissioner for Egypt, who will also be the minister of foreign affairs in the Egyptian Government, and His Majesty's Government would therefore ask that the Government to which you are accredited will be so good as to instruct their representative in Cairo to address all his official communications in future to the high commissioner as minister for foreign affairs."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. OWEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the reservation.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I confess that I can not sympathize with the reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma in regard to Egypt.

In the first place, there is nothing, I think, in the provision of the treaty, article 147, that binds in any way the United States. It is a recognition on the part of Germany alone and by the express terms of the treaty of the protectorate of England over Egypt. I have heard some discussion in this Chamber in regard to England and her policy in Egypt, and I confess also that I have not had much sympathy with the position taken by some Senators. My belief is that England has saved Egypt again and again from bankruptcy, if not from actual anarchy. I do not know what would have transpired at different times since the occupation in 1882 of Egypt by Great Britain if it had not been for Great Britain's counsel and the financial and governmental advisers which she has furnished Egypt from time to time. I wish to call attention briefly to a little history in regard to England's course in Egypt.

The first six years of the British occupation were an unceasing struggle against bankruptcy, for it was not until 1888 that the annual deficit was replaced by financial equilibrium. This happy result was in some measure due to Sir Evelyn Baring's courage and success in facing the powers in 1885 with a demand for permission to raise a new loan of nine millions sterling to pay off the Alexandria war indemnities, to wipe out the deficits of four preceding years, and to provide a million pounds for new works of irrigation. This extra million, skillfully spent, saved the irrigation system, the agricultural crops, the Government taxes, and the finances of Egypt. Since those struggling days, when the finance ministry had difficulty in providing the monthly pay of Government officials, an annual surplus has been gained, taxation relieved by £2,000,000 a year, revenue increased from £9,000,000 (in 1883) to more than £16,000,000 (in 1907), and Egyptian credit raised to a level little below that of the richest European powers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me ask the Senator from what authority he is reading?

Mr. STERLING. I read from the Cambridge Modern History and the subject is entitled "Egypt." The author is F. M. Sandwith.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator tell who wrote it?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir; I will tell the Senator who wrote it.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator will find that it was an English authority who wrote it.

Mr. STERLING. It was written by F. M. Sandwith, M. D., University of Durham, former professor of medicine, Egyptian School of Medicine. That is the authority.

Mr. REED. The Senator has quoted figures showing that the revenue of Egypt has been largely increased?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. To whom was that revenue paid?

Mr. STERLING. The revenue derived was used in paying the expenses of the Government and in agriculture, in irrigation, and in various improvements.

Mr. REED. The revenue was paid to the British Government, was it not?

Mr. STERLING. I think not; I think it was not paid to the British Government; but whether it was handled by British officials or not, it was used for the improvement of Egypt and in these various enterprises. Let me read further.

Mr. OWEN. I will advise the Senator that a large part of it was consumed by tax eaters sent from London down to Cairo.

Mr. STERLING. That is an assumption upon the part of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. No; that is not an assumption; that is a matter of fact.

Mr. STERLING. Let me read as to the facts again:

This extra million skillfully spent saved the irrigation system, the agricultural crops, the Government taxes, and the finances of Egypt.

That is what the author states.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I will say that that is merely the old Tory argument justifying the government and the management of other peoples without their consent.

Mr. STERLING. But I wonder, considering the situation in Egypt with reference to the state of civilization there and with reference to the education of the people, whether English rule, so far as England has ruled, has not been for the advancement and for the uplift of the Egyptian people.

Mr. President, in 1897, 88 per cent of the male population of Egypt could not read or write, and at that same time 99.5 per cent of the female population of Egypt could neither read nor write. Ten million of the people of Egypt are Mohammedans, only about 700,000 are Copts, belonging to the original Egyptian race.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me suggest to the Senator that granting, as I readily grant, all the material benefits which have flowed from English administration in Egypt, it is a sad commentary on the government which has existed until this time that there should have been no diminution of illiteracy from the day of occupation until 1897, the year for which the Senator adduces the figures, and until the present——

Mr. STERLING. I do not agree with the assumption of the Senator that there has been no diminution of illiteracy. I think there has been.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator, then, repeat the figures?

Mr. STERLING. I am giving the figures showing the illiteracy in 1897.

There was 88 per cent of illiteracy on the part of the male population and 99.5 per cent of illiteracy on the part of the female population. The British occupation began really about 1882.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator state what the illiteracy there is now?

Mr. STERLING. I can not state now.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator will discover that they have not been educating those people, but have been keeping them in ignorance, and collecting the taxes from them because of their ignorance and helplessness.

Mr. STERLING. I should be glad to have the Senator furnish the authorities and statistics showing that Great Britain has been keeping the people of Egypt in ignorance. I do not believe it can be shown.

Mr. OWEN. They have been exercising the governing powers there, and they have not educated them. They have not adequately used for the education of the Egyptian people the taxes obtained from the labor of the Egyptian people.

Mr. STERLING. That is the Senator's assertion——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator can not contradict it successfully.

Mr. STERLING. But I can not agree with the assertion. It is so different from the policy of Great Britain wherever she has governed that I can not credit the statement that she has willfully kept the people of any country in ignorance.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, well, Mr. President, the rule of Great Britain over the American Colonies was not very satisfactory in 1776 to the people of this country. Our forefathers had to revolt because of their unsatisfactory and tyrannical management.

Mr. STERLING. Was it because of any policy in regard to education that they revolted?

Mr. OWEN. It is simply imperial human nature repeating itself in Egypt, just as Great Britain undertook to exert an unfair power and unfair taxation over this country, without representation, against which our forefathers revolted.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I did not expect to be drawn into any argument concerning colonial government; but I challenge the Senator from Oklahoma to show any Government that has been more successful in all the world and in all time than Great Britain has been in the government of her colonial possessions.

Mr. OWEN. I admire the British people, but do not admire the imperial element in charge of their foreign office. I think the Senator fails to realize that there is such a thing as human liberty which is deeply desired by all men, as a natural right.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I know that.

Mr. OWEN. And the Egyptians have a right to liberty. When the Turkish suzereinty ceased, the Egyptian sovereignty was legally complete.

Mr. STERLING. I recognize the fact, too, that there is a certain time in the progress of civilization when a people are fit for self-government or free institutions, and not before.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, that is the language of toryism from the foundation of the world.

Mr. STERLING. Nevertheless, whether toryism or liberalism, it is true.

Now, let me read a little further, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator stated that the policy of keeping a race in ignorance was denied by England's conduct in all of her colonies. I think that is the meaning of his words, not the words themselves. I will ask the Senator what about the education of the people of India? England has been in practical control of that country for a long time. What is the degree of illiteracy there?

Mr. STERLING. I can not tell the Senator what the degree of illiteracy in India is, but I believe as fast as England could reasonably educate or provide means for education under the particular government of India she has done so.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to furnish the figures to the Senator in a few moments.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. I will proceed.

Our limits forbid an enumeration of the various benefits which have accrued to Egypt during British rule, but a few of them may be briefly set down. Next to finance, the success of which is due to Lord Cromer himself, the two departments in which British officials have achieved great renown are those of irrigation and the army, for in both the necessary control has been intrusted to experts and there has been no international interference. The British engineers, when summoned from India, found themselves obliged to grapple with chaos resulting from half a century's want of technical skill and administrative morality.

And I think it was from that, as much as from a want of finance, that she suffered—the want of administrative morality.

Canals were cleared and extended, drainage of the land introduced, and the great barrage below Cairo utilized. This dam, though built by forced labor, had cost the Government nearly £2,000,000, and, owing to faulty foundations, had remained practically useless until Sir Colin Scott-Moncreiff rendered it capable of doing excellent service. When the British engineers had been at work for 10 years the cotton crop and sugar crop were both trebled and the country, which had been entirely roadless, was being gradually covered with a series of light railways and agricultural roads.

Talk about education, Mr. President, and what has been done in the matter of school or technical education! Here are the material things that were being done by Great Britain that were of themselves of the greatest educational value to that people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator is speaking about roads having been built and offering that as a proof that these people are free, prosperous, and happy. I want to ask him if Pharaoh did not build roads for the Egyptians with the slave labor of his people many thousands of years ago?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, yes; but that was not done by Great Britain by slave labor.

More good has already accrued to Egypt by the expenditure there of three and a half millions than by the hundred millions of Ismail Pasha's debt. Work is now in progress to add to its usefulness by heightening the existing dam, which will more than double the storage capacity of the reservoir—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, there is another reason why I think we should not, by means of a reservation of this kind, advise Great Britain as to what she should do in regard to a protectorate over Egypt. Lord Milner, lately in charge, has now recommended the withdrawal of a protectorate over Egypt, or is about to recommend it. I hold in my hand a paper containing a dispatch dated Cairo, March 13, only day before yesterday, which reads in part as follows:

With the day approaching for Lord Milner's mission to leave here for the return to London, and after the mission has gathered a mass of evidence regarding Egypt's government, her wishes, and needs, the correspondent here is able to give an authoritative outline of the new Egyptian home-rule measure which Lord Milner will press Parliament to enact.

Lord Milner, it was authoritatively said, will recommend that the protectorate over Egypt be abolished, and that she be accorded a full measure of autonomy, with certain ministries, such as education, agriculture, and interior, to be handled entirely by Egyptians, while England will retain control of finances and the Suez Canal. Also the British will maintain a naval base at Alexandria and keep territorial forces in training there.

Mr. President, this is what Lord Milner will recommend. Let me call attention to another item or two in this same article; and it may be that, although Lord Milner does recommend it, the British Government, taking everything into consideration, may possibly say that for the present, and under existing conditions, the protectorate would better not be withdrawn.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I will advise the Senator that the Egyptian people absolutely refuse to recognize Milner's authority there, and only recently the representatives who were elected to the legislature of Egypt met and declared their own independence. The Egyptian people are practically unanimous with regard to it; and the idea of Great Britain's foreign office "according" to Egypt the rights of sovereignty which the people of Egypt already possess is not tenable.

Mr. STERLING. She can withdraw the protectorate, I suppose.

Mr. OWEN. She can abolish her pretense of a protectorate, yes; but she does not "accord" to them anything. The Egyptians have under international law the sovereignty in their own hands now.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator from Oklahoma think that Egypt should have the management of Egypt's finances in her own hands, considering the history of the past and how she has fared?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely. I will answer the Senator, moreover, that nobody else has any right whatever to take the money raised by the Egyptians for the finances of Egypt and use it for the purpose of filling the pockets of favorites from London.

Mr. STERLING. As I stated a while ago, I think Great Britain has saved Egypt from bankruptcy more than once by her financial advice; and let me say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I think the financial advisers of Great Britain have been welcomed by Egypt in the past, and there is nothing here to indicate that such financial advisers will not be welcomed now.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator would take his information from Egyptian sources instead of taking it from Cambridge sources, he would be much better advised as to the true conditions in Egypt.

Mr. STERLING. I have seen some matters that purport to be from Egyptian sources. I will say to the Senator that I have read Mr. Folk's pamphlet through. Much of it is made up of the assurances that England, through her prime minister or administrators in Egypt, has given from time to time that she would withdraw from Egypt, or that she did not desire to continue in control.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, the British foreign office has been giving assurances continuously and regularly, assuring the world of pious purposes, but it does perform the solemn pledge to withdraw.

Mr. STERLING. I am not disputing the quotations that are given by Mr. Folk in his pamphlet in regard to what has been said.

Mr. OWEN. They are quotations from the official documents.

Mr. STERLING. But I believe every assurance was given in the utmost good faith and with the intent upon the part of Great Britain to withdraw; but events have come crowding thick and fast upon one another, so that the time has not come when she could withdraw with safety to the people of Egypt themselves and the interests of civilization.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that ambitions to govern other people without their consent have been coming thick and fast upon one another.

Mr. STERLING. Great Britain never wanted to get into Egypt. Circumstances forced her to do so.

Mr. OWEN. Unhappily the foreign office never wanted to get out, notwithstanding the solemn official pledges to get out.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must first address the Chair and secure permission to interrupt.

Mr. REED and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just stated that Great Britain never wanted to get into Egypt. Does he not recall the circumstance that between dark and daylight Lord Beaconsfield secretly closed the deal which gave England control of the Suez Canal and thus put England into Egypt?

Mr. STERLING. I remember something about that, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. She has been there even since, has she not?

Mr. STERLING. Great Britain and France were watching each other for some years in regard to the control in Egypt. Great Britain was more interested in the Suez Canal than all the other nations of the world combined. In the year 1907 alone British ships to the number of 2,651 went through the Suez Canal. The nation that had the next greatest number of ships was Germany, and she sent through in that year 580 ships; so you can see Great Britain's interest in the Suez Canal.

Mr. REED and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Missouri, if he has not yet finished.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator speaks of British interests. Does he not know that it was French genius that built the canal, when England had not lifted her hands, and does he not know that France had the canal constructed because of her great interests, that while it was done through Egyptian engineering, it was French genius and French money?

Mr. STERLING. It was rather through the engineering genius of De Lesseps that it was constructed than the fact that it would affect or benefit France more than any other country. It must have been obvious from the beginning that financially, and as an outlet to the Orient, it would benefit Great Britain more than any other country in the world and because she was the greatest commercial country in the world, with her colonies in India and Africa besides.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to remind the Senator that this remarkably great interest of Great Britain in the Suez Canal was because the Tory British foreign office was carrying on the same kind of an overlordship over 300,000,000 people in India and governing them without their consent, and gathering the taxes of that land without their consent, so that the policies in Egypt and India hang well together.

Mr. STERLING. She has not governed them to their disadvantage, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. That is the same old Tory argument. It is not a question of governing them to their advantage, but governing them at all against their consent. The Egyptian people are entitled to liberty and should not be enslaved by a Tory foreign office against their consent. The United States ought not to underwrite the slavery of the Egyptians.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. This is all very interesting, but I dislike very much to hear this criticism of our ally in the league.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if I may proceed to read just one or two words more from this article. It touches the question whether, all in all, it may be considered the desirable thing for England to relinquish her protectorate now:

> An actual Egyptian government, with Egyptians holding the offices, would dissipate the peculiar fears of the people and silence the agitators, in so far as their chief argument is concerned.
> Although the future of Egypt seems encouraging, the present is fraught with danger, and the interim between now and eventual Egyptian self-government might even see Bolshevism unless stern measures of a temporary nature are taken. Fear is expressed here that the new social movement now afoot in Egypt is transcending the nationalist agitation against England.

In view of these statements, Mr. President, the question is whether, in order to prevent the spread of Bolshevism and consequent anarchy throughout Egypt, it might not be well for England for yet a little while, until conditions are settled and stabilized, to retain her protectorate over Egypt. I continue reading:

> Even a superficial observer can see that the seeds of southern Europe's unrest have a fertile field here, where the people are famous in history for their turbulent spirit. To-day they have a real economic and an imagined political grievance.

I think that it is largely in view of their imagined rather than real political grievances that they are seeking the withdrawal of the British protectorate at this time.

Mr. President, I do not believe, in the light of the history of Great Britain's rule in Egypt or considering the conditions under which she declared her protectorate in 1914, after the breaking out of the war, or as conditions now exist, that we here, by way of reservation to this treaty, should seem to advise England in regard to that protectorate.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, there is another authority who might be consulted while the debate turns upon Egyptian right to liberty. In the third verse of the seventh chapter of Matthew it is written:

> Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

It is true that the net result of British Government in Egypt has been the material development of the country to the neglect of the education of the people and their political advantage. But, Mr. President, if we are not to guarantee the government of Egypt, it is hardly a matter for our intervention. It would become us to inquire if in some measure we have not been responsible for a like neglect of some dark people with whose welfare we are charged under the Constitution of the United States. My friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] speaks of the imposition or the withdrawal of the protectorate in Egypt as an assumption of right on the part of the British, a right which does not exist. I can not quarrel with him on that ground; but while we discuss the course of the British Government in that regard, I think we might inquire of our own conscience if we have done all that duty requires of us in regard to some 10,000,000 people living under the Constitution of the Union.

It is written in the Constitution of the Republic that no citizen shall be disfranchised by reason of his color; it is written that if there be any general disfranchisement there shall be a diminution of the representation of the States effecting the disfranchisement. But these provisions of the Constitution are as dead as the liberty of Egypt. But putting aside the question of political rights, consider that the country, North and South, during the last year has witnessed disgraceful mob murders. There have been fourscore lynchings in the Union during the 12 months last passed.

My own State of Illinois has been the scene of violence on as great a scale as that in any other State in the Union during the last year.

As we sit in judgment upon others, so let us judge of our own duty. It does not become us to speak only of the dereliction of other people. If this Senate is to consider resolves upon the state of the people of Egypt, let it make ready to resolve against mob murder and lynching in America.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is evident that we can not hope to get a vote to-night on the reservation that has just been offered. There are one or two other Senators who desire to be heard upon it. Therefore I move that the Senate, in open executive session, take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 16, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 15, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH).

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God of hosts, lest we forget, impress indelibly upon our minds and write it in our hearts the horrors of war and its aftermath which bring grief, sorrow, and unmitigated evil to the world; and grant that our historians may write in lurid pictures its horrid effects for future generations.

Teach us, we beseech Thee, the wisdom and joy of peace, the glory of living together in brotherly love; after the similitude of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 13, 1920, was read and approved.

DEATH OF JAMES CLARK.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for not to exceed five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for not to exceed five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, on what subject?

Mr. SEARS. I do not think the gentleman will object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, if the Members of the House have been taught anything during the past three years, it has been the uncertainty of life. Many times we have noticed the flag at half-mast, and, in fact, it has been rather unusual not to see the flag at half-mast. A great many of the boys have lost their lives, and sorrow has been brought to the Members of the House.

It is with feelings of deep regret that I announce to the Members of this House that this morning Uncle Jimmie Clark, who for 15 years has faithfully served this House both under Republican and Democratic administrations, has passed to the great beyond. There was never a more efficient servant of the people, a man absolutely loyal to his friends, and who took a deep interest in carrying out the trust imposed upon him. As a recognition of that, only recently the Members of this House, regardless of party, unanimously placed him on the permanent roll. He was kind, extremely courteous, and polite, a fact which will be verified by the Members of the House and by the wives of those Members who are married.

Uncle Jimmie was born on October 9, 1850, in Barker County, Ala., and was a brother of our beloved colleague, Hon. FRANK CLARK, of Florida. I am glad that, so far as I am concerned, Uncle Jimmie knew what I thought of him while he was living.

The funeral will take place Wednesday at 11 o'clock a. m. at Lee's undertaking establishment, 322 Pennsylvania Avenue NW., and I am sure the Members of this House will join with me in the deep regret of which these few words are an inadequate expression.

DEATH OF MRS. TIMBERLAKE.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for indefinite leave of absence for our colleague, Hon. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE, of Colorado. Mrs. Timberlake, a woman of exceptional ability and beauty of character and charm of life, passed into the great beyond on yesterday. Our colleague left this morning on the sad journey to his home at Sterling, Colo., with the remains of his beloved life partner.

I ask for indefinite leave of absence for Mr. TIMBERLAKE and for leave of absence until Thursday for our colleague, Mr. VAILE, who accompanied Mr. TIMBERLAKE as far as the city of Chicago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, indefinite leave of absence will be granted to the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. TIMBERLAKE, and leave of absence until Thursday to the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. VAILE. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RATIFICATION OF WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT BY WEST VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a communication from the governor of the State of West Virginia announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the military reorganization bill, the Calendar for Unanimous Consent will be called.

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10328) to amend an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the construction of a bridge in place thereof."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to passing the bill without prejudice?

There was no objection.

PRINT PAPER.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the consideration of House resolution 489.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia makes a privileged motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HARRISON moves to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from further consideration of House resolution 489.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 489.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby requested to furnish to the House of Representatives such information as he may have in regard to the supply, distribution, and consumption of print paper in the United States; such information as he may have in regard to any shortage in the supply of such print paper and the classes of newspapers or periodicals that have been affected by such shortage; whether any class of newspapers have secured by contract or otherwise any undue preference or advantage over other classes of newspapers in the supply of print paper; and such information as he may have in regard to the issuance of any regulations governing the distribution and consumption of said print paper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this motion in order at this time, when we are calling the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman makes it as a privileged motion.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is the motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is to discharge the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I move the adoption of the resolution which has just been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the further consideration of the resolution and to pass the resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to save the question whether it is a privileged motion or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. It calls for information from one of the departments.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ANTHONY. To speak to the question of privilege. I understand the resolution has been pending in the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for more than seven days without action by the committee, and therefore privileged.

Mr. MADDEN. It is only a question whether the contents of the resolution are of a privileged character. I think the resolution asks for an opinion from the head of a department.

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. I have not examined it, but that is what I judge from hearing it read.

Mr. HARRISON. It merely calls for information.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I shall not make a point of order, but the resolution says:

> Whether any class of newspapers have secured by contract or otherwise any undue preference or advantage over other classes of newspapers in the supply of print paper.

If that is not a matter of opinion, I do not know what opinion means.

Mr. HARRISON. If there are facts in the possession of the department showing that certain classes of newspapers have gotten undue preference, that is the information we want. That is not an opinion on the part of the Secretary of Commerce, but whether he has the facts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is a matter of opinion whether they have been given undue preference. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is there any information asked for in this resolution which is not now common knowledge?

Mr. HARRISON. I think there is.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know what it is, everybody knows that there is a shortage of print paper. There is a resolution, I think, pending in some committee of the House, introduced in the Senate by Senator UNDERWOOD, containing some proposition with reference to dealing with Canada with the hope of alleviating the present conditions concerning print paper.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was going to state that the Underwood resolution deals solely with negotiations with Canada relative to the admission of print paper and pulp wood. If I may go further, I will say that it seems that the Department of Justice has been sleeping on its job in reference to compromising the suit by the Government against the International Paper Co. which controls the big end of the paper supply, wherein that company agreed to release a certain portion of its output. It is thought that it has failed to do so, at any rate the small consumer can not get any print paper. Now, the gentleman's resolution asks practically for that information.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It asks, practically, that the Secretary of Commerce, who knows nothing about the matter, shall make an investigation as to whether anyone has been given undue preference. I do not think myself any Secretary of Commerce that we have had is qualified to pass on that question—with all due respect to the ability of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The language the gentleman read simply requires the Secretary of Commerce to state whether or not special favors were granted any particular newspaper. If it is true, then the documents themselves, the contracts, are facts, and it is not asking for an opinion.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is asking for an opinion as to whether undue preference has been given. Everyone that knows anything knows that print paper is not sold at the same price; that large contracts are entered into by the year or a series of years at different prices. Now, whether that is an undue preference I do not think is for the Secretary of Commerce, who knows paper when he sees it but knows nothing about the subject matter, to determine. Whoever in his department investigates it knows nothing about it—whether it is undue preference or not. I shall not object myself to passing the resolution. I think we ought to do something if we can, on the basis of what we know now.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman from Kansas is not quite correct when he says that smaller newspapers are not able to get print paper. Some are not able to get it at all because of the shortage, but many are able to get it; but the trouble lies in the fact that they have to pay such enormous, exorbitant prices for it that they are not able financially to buy in large quantities or to buy it at all and make a living in the business. It is this combination on prices of print paper that has put it up beyond the reach of most of the small newspapers.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is mistaken; it is the shortage of print paper. The International Paper Co., that being the largest company, and several other large companies have annual contracts with large newspapers that use a great quantity of paper. Those contracts used to extend over several years; I do not know what they now provide. The small newspapers buy their paper from the jobbers and wholesalers, and the shortage of paper has unduly put up the price to the small publishers, no doubt about that.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the very compromise mentioned by the gentleman from Kansas, this corporation has refused to turn out paper which it could turn out or turn loose if it wanted to, but which it has held from sale because its contracts did not require it to turn it loose to parties not having contracts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How does the gentleman know what the contract covers? There is no doubt that the International Paper Co. has contracts to cover all their output. There is a shortage of paper, and this resolution asks the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce whether there is an undue preference given to newspapers. That will delay any action by the Government, and will do nothing else.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to reserve the point of order long enough to make a short statement. I have a letter which came into my possession Saturday from a meeting of the newspaper publishers held in the city of Chicago last week, at which a large number of publishers were present. They had under consideration the question of print-paper shortage. They were trying to devise ways and means by which the newspapers of the country could get such newsprint paper as they required. They all recognize the shortage of paper and the difficulties that surround the situation. It was the consensus of opinion that where people were able to contract for paper within the limit, the manufacturers' supply of paper can be bought at a uniform price of 4 to 4½ cents per pound. But it was also the unanimous opinion, based on facts in the case, that the trouble with the small paper owner is that instead of being able to buy from the manufacturer he is compelled to buy from the broker, and the broker has been charging exorbitant, excessive, and unjust prices. There was a tendency, I may safely say, on the part of all the newspaper owners in question, for there were large and small papers, representing all of the elements of the newspaper business in the country there, to do everything within their power to help obtain for the small papers such paper as they might require at a reasonable price. However, how are you going to stop a commission man or a broker from acting as an intermediary through which the small paper, not having ability to take in a large supply, has to get its supply? There is no way in the world, unless you can organize some arrangement through the Government to buy the paper and make a distribution of it. I do not know whether it is wise to organize a Government agency to buy paper for distribution to newspaper owners in the United States, and I do not know whether the newspaper owners themselves would be willing that that should be done. Just as soon as you find people in any line of effort who are unable to go into the market and offer to contract and buy under the contract, who are compelled by circumstances in the case to buy through any agency they can, buying from hand to mouth, they are going to have to pay more for their supplies than anybody else would.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he does or does not favor the organization of some agency in the Government to assist in the purchase of paper?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether that is a wise thing to do. I am saying that it may be, although I am not sure about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was conferring last week with members of the Federal Trade Commission who have gone into this paper situation, and some of them expressed the opinion that that was the only practical solution of the matter for the small newspaper that was unable to buy in carload quantities.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, a man must not expect to be able to go into the market through a broker and obtain paper at the same price as the man who buys by the hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth under contract.

Mr. BARKLEY. Some of these large paper dealers are selling to their contractors at 4½ cents a pound, while the small paper man has to pay 10 and 11 cents a pound for the same thing.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I say; and that is because he has to buy through a broker.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the only reason that he has to go to a broker is because he has not capital enough to make large contracts.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I think the gentleman is in error in that statement. I personally know of hundreds of newspapers that have ample capital with which to buy paper, but they can not buy it. The International Paper Co. will not sell to them, refusing to do so point-blank.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I do not know anything about that.

Mr. ANTHONY. They have the money to buy the paper the same as the big papers, but the big papers are favored by contracts which take practically all of the production.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not making the statement, but I am merely reporting what came to me from this meeting.

Mr. ANTHONY. The situation is this: Is it fair that the International Paper Co. shall sell to the New York Times and the Chicago Tribune all of their paper at 5 cents a pound, which is the price recently fixed in the last few days, and yet that a man in Judge HARRISON's district who wants to get 10 or 11 carloads must pay 10 cents a pound for it?

Mr. HARRISON. Twelve and thirteen cents a pound for it.

Mr. MADDEN. The International Paper Co. does not sell any paper to the Chicago Tribune. The Chicago Tribune owns its own paper factory.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the New York Times also has its own paper factory.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe the International Paper Co. has any dealings whatever with the Chicago Tribune. In fact, the Chicago Tribune is not only making its supply, but, I believe, it is selling paper to other people who want it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course, I mean papers of that class.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has referred repeatedly to small papers. I know of several large daily papers who can not get paper even at 9½ cents a pound, and they say that unless some relief is given they will have to shut down. In this connection, if the gentleman will permit, the present occupant of the chair, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], has repeatedly, as the gentleman knows, called attention of the House to the extravagant waste of paper in the Government service. I received the following letter a few days since, portions of which I desire to call to the attention of the House:

MARCH 10, 1920.

Congressman JOE SEARS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am going to ask your assistance in remedying what seems to me a gross evil on the part of the United States Government. It may be out of your jurisdiction, but I would appreciate whatever you can do to assist us in the line that I am going to suggest.

I refer to the communications which are being sent out by the Government covering various matters, which find their way into the waste-basket. There are certainly thousands of dollars in clerk hire and thousands of dollars in bond and news print being wasted weekly.

I have before me Circular No. 668, Department of the Interior, General Land Office, Washington, "Regulations for the Sale of Abandoned Military Reservation at Batton Island."

Now, Mr. SEARS, there is a little note which accompanies this which reads as follows: "Please give this circular what publicity you can as a news item without expense to the United States."

Patriotism is beginning to cease as a virtue and become a burden. During the war the newspapers submitted to all manner of unreasonable requests in the name of patriotism, while other classes of industry became rich upon the cost-plus system. It is time that the Government realized the necessity of paying for the space they request of newspapers. To me it is an insult to ask us to sell their "war equipment" and their "legal subdivisions" through our advertising space as "news items."

Assuring you, my dear sir, that I will appreciate whatever action is taken in this, I am,

——— ———.

I will say frankly that I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was correct many times, and that bulletins are sent out not only in duplicate but in triplicate. I receive three or four bulletins sometimes from the same department.

Mr. MADDEN. We all do.

Mr. SEARS. Of course, that should be corrected; but leaving that aside, the newspapers of this country should have and must have relief.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree to that.

Mr. SEARS. Or they are going out of business.

Mr. MADDEN. But I do not think we are going to get very far with relief through any conversation we have on the floor of this House. I do not believe the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] will reach the point at all, and I am not sure that anything we can do will reach it; but if there is anything to be done that will reach it, I am for that thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the genfleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution and to discharge the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the resolution for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman move to discharge the committee and pass the resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is debatable, and the gentleman is recognized.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read this editorial from the Daily News-Record, a very enterprising paper published in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia at Harrisonburg, Va.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Daily News-Record, Thursday, Mar. 4, 1920.]

THE NEWS-PRINT SITUATION.

No such condition has ever confronted the publishers of the country as confronts them now—a condition that should not be allowed to exist. They are being "held up" and robbed by the paper companies who control the news-print paper supply.

The fact that publishers have contracts for a supply of news print—at rates which are extortionate compared with prewar prices, but still less than half what is now demanded by these brigands for paper in the open market—does not protect them from the "hold up," except in a very limited degree. Many publishers have contracts for their supply at 4½ cents to 5 cents per pound; the open-market price is 10¾ cents. The paper companies ignore their contracts, saying they can not get cars in which to ship the contract paper, but in the same breath they offer to ship paper at the open-market price. We are in receipt of a letter from a prominent newspaper man who is in public life, from which we quote some extracts:

"The truth is that the American paper companies—at least many of them—are operated by a set of brigands, the last one of whom should be in the penitentiary. For example, notwithstanding my paper has a contract with ——— Paper Co. for a certain supply of news print, the company is failing to keep its contract, giving as an excuse inability to secure cars. In the same breath they offer to let me have a car of paper at the open-market price of 10¾ cents. What I want to know is, if they can get a car to send me open-market paper, why can't they get a car to send me contract paper? The simple answer is they want to steal the $2,000 excess from me—and are going to do it."

We concur most heartily with his conclusion that "the question will never be settled right until some of these fellows are put in the penitentiary."

The small dailies and weeklies that have to submit to being held up by these highwaymen can not understand why it is that the Congress can not, and does not take some action to protect them from such outrageous profiteering; at no time during the active prosecution of the war were prices of news print more than half as high as now.

The power of Congress to give relief from these unbearable conditions can not be questioned; it has exercised that power in such a number of instances that the apparent apathy now to correct a condition that all agree is a public scandal is unexplainable.

Mr. HARRISON. I now ask to be read the following letter I received from the Hon. George B. Keezell, a gentleman thoroughly posted on the newspaper situation, and whose ability is recognized throughout Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE DAILY NEWS-RECORD,
Harrisonburg, Va., February 27, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS W. HARRISON.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing you a clipping from the Baltimore Sun of to-day.

The newsprint situation has gotten to the point when it is little if any short of a public scandal that publishers are held up and required to pay the outrageous prices they are charged for newsprint. Those who were not under contract with the manufacturers or their representatives are having to pay 10 cents for paper, which has been furnished at 4½ since January 1 and it is now proposed to charge 5 cents for, to those who had been contract purchasers.

In other words, if we had been been purchasing from the International or some other concern under a yearly contract at 3½ or 4 cents, and that contract expired on January 1, the manufacturers would renew it for the first three months of the new year at 4½ cents, and each three months after at some price. If we had been regular customers but not under contract they would charge us anywhere from 8¾ to 10 cents at the factory, if they would furnish it at all. The result of this is to practically confiscate the property of these publishers who have to pay such a price.

It does seem that there should be some legal remedy for such outrageous discriminations and some relief for these publishers who are charged such outrageous profits. If 5 cents per pound pays a reasonable profit—and if it did not, manufacturers would not furnish the paper—what justification can there be for charging another consumer double that price?

No reasonable publisher wants the products of the manufacturer at less than a reasonable profit. He is willing to pay cash for what he gets on delivery. His business is at least a quasi-public business, one that was used by the Government in its war propaganda to the very fullest extent, and without the aid of which the bond issues could never have been floated. It does seem that a condition has been reached when there should be some governmental action to protect against the conscienceless profiteer.

Very truly, GEO. B. KEEZELL.

Mr. HARRISON. It may be, as asserted, that big newspapers have obtained some precedence by reason of the fact that they give large contracts, but from these letters and from the facts shown here there has been a gross discrimination against the smaller newspapers of this country. They are virtually being driven out of business, and I do not know of any greater calamity that could befall this country than for the local newspapers in our country communities to be driven out of business. They serve a great purpose. I recall in Virginia history a boast by a Virginia governor in colonial times, Sir William Berkeley, who said he thanked God that there was not a free school and there was not a newspaper published in this land and he hoped there would not be one in a hundred years. It was such a condition as that which made such governors possible. To-day America leads the world in public-school facilities and in the number and character of her newspapers. America has more newspapers, many times told, than all the rest of the world together. The local country newspaper, daily or weekly, fills a more important place in the life of America than the great American dailies. The country paper was one of the great sufferers of war conditions. It contributed its columns to patriotic activities and kept the great heart of America aglow to the great purposes of the war. It is a shame if we allow a band of unpatriotic profiteers to drive the country paper to the wall.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman as to the importance of this subject, but the gentleman is aware of the fact that the Federal Trade Commission has already been investigating this subject, and that we have had hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. HARRISON. All I am after here is to get some sort of action on the part of the House. These commissions are going to do nothing unless this House gets busy on this subject, and a large number of these newspapers are being put out of business.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield further, if this company is furnishing paper only where it has contracts, and that takes all of its supply, it can not be compelled to do anything else. If on the other hand it is arbitrarily refusing to sell to the country newspapers, it ought to be prosecuted by the Department of Justice.

Mr. HARRISON. I will read the gentleman a statement here from a newspaper publisher who is in public life and knows what he is talking about. He says:

The truth is that the American paper companies, or at least many of them, are operated by a set of brigands, the last one of whom should be in the penitentiary. For example, notwithstanding my paper has a contract with ——— Paper Co. for a certain supply of newsprint, the company is failing to keep its contract, giving as an excuse inability to secure cars. In the same breath they offered to let me have a car of paper at the open-market price of 10¾ cents. What I want to know is, if they can get a car to send me open-market paper why can not they get a car to send me contract paper?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is a case for the Department of Justice.

Mr. HARRISON. He says:

The simple answer is, they want to steal the $2,000 excess from me and are going to do it.

I think there ought to be some power in this body that could put a stop to such a business as that. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. This resolution will not do it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, all I aim here to do is to call attention of this body to the situation in this country.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. In connection with the gentleman's proposal I wish to call attention to the fact that some weeks ago I introduced a bill and also have a motion entered before my committee to suspend the present tariff of 12 per cent on the importation of print paper, in view of the fact that on April 1 the Canadian price is going to 5 cents a pound. Under the present law print paper comes in free of this 12 per cent duty unless the price rises to as much as 5 cents. Now, the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, as I understand, takes the view that the spot market—and that is the market that many of our smaller newspapers buy on—the spot market is fixed more or less by the import price from Scandinavia, where during recent weeks a substantial amount of print paper is coming from, and the spot price they say is fixed more or less by this import price plus the 12 per cent tariff. Now, my proposal was simply to suspend it for a couple of years by raising the import price to 8 or 10 cents a pound.

Mr. HARRISON. The point I make is, why these various legislative propositions can not be gotten before this House in order to give the necessary relief. That is all I have in view in bringing this matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman's resolution asks the Secretary of Commerce for this information. I do not know what steps the Department of Commerce have taken to gather the information which he seeks, but I desire to call his attention to this fact. The Federal Trade Commission has all these facts before it, and they have had quite a lot to do with the matter of print paper during the last few years. I wonder if the gentleman will be as well satisfied if the resolution were amended so as to call on the Federal Trade Commission for this information other than the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. MADDEN. You can not call on the Federal Trade Commission by resolution of the House. You have to do that through the President of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am fearful this resolution will not get the real information, because the Secretary of Commerce has not dealt with it.

Mr. HARRISON. I want action on the part of this House on the several legislative propositions pending in committee. I can not think we have to see a great bulwark of American liberties booted out of existence by a lot of profiteers and answer their appeals by acknowledging our helplessness.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I would like to have the gentleman yield me some time.

Mr. HARRISON. How much time?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, say, 10 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the situation concerning print paper in the United States to-day is very deplorable, to say the least. Whether it can be remedied by a more equitable distribution of paper I do not undertake to say. Newsprint paper is made out of what is known as ground pulp wood. Ground pulp wood is made out of spruce wood, in the main, with some balsam fir used with the mixture. Up until the time, or shortly before the time, the special committee made an investigation on this subject a few years ago there was plenty of print paper in the United States for all consumption and at a very low price.

But the spruce wood is very limited in area in the eastern portion of the United States. It does not do very much good to have large quantities of spruce wood on the Pacific coast or up in Alaska, because freight rates become almost prohibitive. The great supply of spruce wood on this continent is in Canada, just to the north of us. Immense forests of spruce wood are there, and the paper mills supplying the newsprint paper for the United States are located principally in Maine, New York, Wisconsin, and Canada. Up to a few years ago we had a tariff on print paper of $6 a ton. At the time the Payne tariff law was passed there was quite a controversy here as to what the tariff should be. A special committee was appointed by the House, which recommended a tariff of $2 a ton. That recommendation was not followed in the Payne tariff law. When the Underwood tariff law was passed, it took off the duty entirely on print paper of a value of less than $2.50 a hundred. The result of all this has been that the paper manufacturers, on the one hand, have been afraid to establish new manufacturing plants in the United States, because their supply of pulp wood would have to come from Canada, and they were afraid they could not compete on even terms in the manufacture of newsprint paper in the United States without any tariff at all. For a time after the passage and before the passage of the Underwood tariff law large companies acquired great areas of pulp wood alone in Canada, partly with the view of supplying their mills in the United States and partly with the view of establishing newsprint paper manufacturing establishments. But no one knew what the Canadian Government might do. It might at any time, if it chose, either put an export duty on pulp wood or an export duty on print paper, or an embargo on either one.

And the great companies—and there are a number of very large companies, of which the International Paper Co. is the largest—engaged in the manufacture of print paper. Because of these uncertainties, and because up until a recent period the manufacture of print paper was not especially profitable, there had been practically no new plants erected. The increase in print paper has been negligible, even since the time the special committee made its report, with the exception that at the large plant at International Falls in Minnesota there has been but little increase in the productive capacity in the manufacture of print paper, but the consumption in the last few years, and especially in the last year, has increased enormously. No one can look at any newspaper, metropolitan or rural, without seeing the increase in the quantity of advertising matter. That has increased the demand for print paper, and with the increase in the demand for print paper and lack of increase in the supply of print paper it has been inevitable, first, that the price should rise, and, second, that those who did not have annual contracts would apparently at first get the worst of it. I do not know whether there is any way of so permanently settling our relations with Canada with reference to pulp wood and newsprint paper that we shall either give to the paper manufacturers a certainty under which they can establish new plants in the United States or else new plants in Canada. It does not make so much difference to us whether print paper is manufactured in Canada or here, but there is a necessity of these men being given an idea that if they establish these plants either in Canada or the United States they will not be interfered with adversely by subsequent legislation or orders in council.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was informed last Saturday by the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission that the print-paper production in February was 5 per cent larger than in January; in January it was 5 per cent larger than in December; and in December 5 per cent larger than in November. Is the gentleman advised as to whether that is a normal increase in the production or whether it is larger than the average?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know. That is simply the plants running full time, or something of that sort. These plants usually run 24 hours in a day.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would figure in a year about 400 per cent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the capacity of the plants has been materially increased.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will permit, I think I can answer the question in regard to the increase of the newsprint paper. A large number of manila-paper mills, which have never manufactured newsprint paper to any great extent before, have gone into the manufacture of newsprint paper on account of the excessive cost.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And the same plants that can manufacture newsprint paper can manufacture wall paper, and frequently they change from one to the other. They can manufacture print paper or wall paper. It may be that wall paper will be manufactured next summer when it is being largely consumed.

Mr. BARKLEY. And is it not true that a large number of the board plants have been turned over to the manufacture of paper?

Mr. ROMJUE. I understand from the discussion that the supply of spruce wood now is limited.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is a large quantity of it, but still it is limited.

Mr. ROMJUE. Do you not think, with the shortage of spruce wood in the East, that that on the western coast could be utilized? Is not the failure due to that as much as to the Underwood tariff?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is a large quantity of spruce wood grown in the East. I am not charging the Underwood tariff law with the responsibility. But the uncertainty in these different laws have kept these people from putting up new plants.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Texas begins I ask that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], because I want to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois two minutes more?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I take it for granted that the gentleman from Illinois knows more about this print-paper business than any other living man.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not admit that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is well enough not to be too bashful. The gentleman made a thorough investigation of it once. Now, I want to ask if the gentleman has any idea in his head as to how to relieve the bad situation in which these papers are now placed?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I doubt if there is any method of relieving it temporarily or immediately, but I think if we could, through international relations with Canada, satisfy the men who are in a position to go into the business and who have the money to put into the business that they could have suitable relations between this country and Canada with reference to the manufacture and bringing in of print paper, so that they would put up new mills in Canada, where the print paper can be most cheaply manufactured by the side of the pulp wood, which they now have under lease or ownership, there would be a plentiful increase of print paper. But whether they will do it anyhow by reason of the high price of print paper I do not know. Of course, if the International Paper Co., or the Berlin Mills, or any other concern, believed that the present price of print paper would stay where it is now, they would all start to build mills.

Mr. MADDEN. And then, of course, the price would go down.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why is it that they have not erected mills out on the Pacific coast, where the gentleman says the spruce wood is so plentiful?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Because the freight charges between the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast and midway between would amount to a great deal more than the cost of the pulp wood, to begin with.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not mean the pulp wood. I mean the paper.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, the freight charges on the paper are very high.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not possible, by resolution of this House, that the Governments of the United States and Great Britain or Canada could establish treaty relations that would assure for a period of 15 years at least that the conditions should remain stable?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I should think that that might be possible in some way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that there is a large plant now being erected on the Pacific coast. Of course, it takes a long time to erect these paper plants. Some time ago—I can not say just when it was—negotiations were commenced with our Forestry Department to establish a large paper plant on the shores of Alaska, the southern part of it, where spruce wood is plentiful, and where deep-water vessels can come in, and where also they can get the fresh water that is necessary for the manufacture of pulp and paper; but the stumpage charge was thought to be prohibitive by the company that desired to establish the plant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The freight charge would be prohibitive. Mr. Speaker, I ask for another minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not see how the freight charge would be high, because it would all come around by water.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The freight charge would be excessively high. The cargoes would have to be exclusively composed of that product.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I wanted to make a statement in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and say that I interested myself in the matter of pulp-wood paper recently, and took it up with the Federal Trade Commission, and they advised me that last year the production of print paper increased 6 per cent and the consumption of it increased 38 per cent.

Mr. BARKLEY. I had reference to the monthly increase.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman another minute.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman left the impression, on my mind at least, that the failure of the American mills to develop the industry in this country was due to the lack of adequate tariff protection. I wanted to inquire of the gentleman if another contributing factor was not the fact that the American mills could not know in advance whether they would be allowed to bring over the pulp?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I precisely stated that. The gentleman listened to only a portion of my remarks. I did not lay it on the tariff. That was one of the uncertainties, that they did not know, and do not know now, whether Canada at any time will lay an export duty on pulp and print paper or put an embargo on print paper and pulp wood, or either one.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The American Newspaper Publishers' Association, through some of their officials, represent that since the import prices had gone to 5 cents a pound, in view of all the circumstances, it would reduce the import value $24 a ton by suspending the 12 per cent tariff rate, which operates when the import price reaches 5 cents a pound, by extending it for a year or two. What is the gentleman's judgment in that respect?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. My recollection is—and the gentleman can tell me whether it is correct or not—that the present tariff is nothing when paper is less than $2.50 a hundred.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Less than 5 cents a pound. It has been raised.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is another contributing cause to the fact that they will not build paper plants. If they had kept it at 2½ cents a pound probably the paper in Canada would not have gone much above that. That is why we put the provision in. What the temporary effect is I do not know, but every temporary expedient that is used will only add to the uncertainties in the minds of the manufacturers.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I think the gentleman will recall that when it was raised to 5 cents the import price had either gone up or was about to go up.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It was raised in my absence. I will say to the gentleman that I drew that provision in the Underwood tariff law myself.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will if I have the time.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from Illinois says that the only remedy——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I did not say "remedy." I do not know that there is any——

Mr. CONNALLY. Would be the hope of taking it up with Canada and entering into some arrangement. I will say that there is now pending before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs a resolution that has also passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the Underwood resolution touching that very matter, and if that could be gotten before the House it might solve the problem.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not read the Underwood resolution. I only noticed it in the newspapers. I hoped some committee would take action on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know much about the technical features of this print-paper proposition. I had the misfortune to be Speaker of this House in 1908 when there came a demand from the publishers, which demand was organized and pushed. Such a demand is very formidable when the metropolitan papers are organized. That demand was that I should recognize somebody to move to suspend the rules on a Monday to put print paper on the free list. It being on the eve of a presidential election the Ways and Means Committee had postponed the consideration of that bill until the next session, when the election would be over, and there was no way to get at it except to bulldoze me, and I refused to be bulldozed. Then a resolution was introduced to create a committee to investigate. I appointed that committee, and my colleague [Mr. MANN] was chairman of it. It made a very thorough investigation covering the whole ground. Now, under the present conditions, with the great increase in the use of print paper, hell is to pay and there is no pitch hot. I do not know what the remedy is to be. If there comes a matter of legislation I am going to follow my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN], because I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the former Speaker of this House, who has paid Mr. MANN the tribute of saying that he knows more about this matter than all of us. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] two minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was mistaken when he said a few moments ago that wall paper had not yet become hard to get and had not gotten out of reach. The wall-paper dealers of my district report that it is absolutely impossible to get wall paper at this time; that when they do get it it comes in from five to six months late.

I have last Friday's Fort Worth Star-Telegram, on the front page of which it says that the spot price now for print paper is 11 cents, and that the next order will probably cost 12 cents a pound; that it is absolutely impossible for a small weekly paper to pay 12 cents a pound and publish a newspaper at any profit whatever; and that unless something is done soon to relieve the situation it is going to put every single small newspaper in the country out of business. There are over 50 weekly papers published in my district.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not much time, but I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. The Post Office Department notified me that 1,300 newspapers have suspended in five months because they could not afford to continue.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and they are suspending every week. These papers mean everything to their home communities. I take all of these papers from my district. I get better acquainted with all my people through these local weekly newspapers which I get each week than in any other way. I find out what my people are doing, what they are thinking about, what they feel, and what they want. I say these papers are a great benefit to their communities. Some of them haul me over the coals once in a while, and are going to continue to do it. Gentlemen need not think I am trying to curry favor with them by asking for their prompt relief, because I am not, but I want to see even the ones that are against me continue to exist. I want to see them continue to thrive and live. They have a right to do so, but they are going to be put out of business unless the price of print paper is reduced. Why this inaction? Why does it take an hour to pass this resolution?

Why has not the Underwood resolution been passed by this House? It is not going to solve the whole problem, but it will be productive of some good, as far as it goes. It is calculated to be of some benefit. And we should leave no stone unturned in our effort to force some relief, and do it quickly. The steering committee should take hold of the matter and have this Underwood resolution brought before the House speedily and passed.

On February 18, 1920, I introduced H. R. 12611 to limit the number of pages in newspapers entitled to transmission through the mails, and the passage of such a resolution would grant some relief immediately. I hope that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which this bill was referred, will promptly report the same favorably. It does not need a hearing, as its merit and necessity are patent on its face. We must take some steps at once to save our rural newspapers.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman, though I have very little time.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the statements that have been made, does not the gentleman think the Department of Justice should take a hand?

Mr. BLANTON. The Department of Justice is getting busy, but we ought to get busy, too. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, to which I referred, says that it has suspended three editions in an effort to try to relieve the situation.

Mr. DOWELL. Has the gentleman any evidence that the Department of Justice is getting busy in this matter?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, some evidence. If the gentleman will ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], he can tell of some effort on the part of the Department of Justice. But it ought to do more and force some relief.

Mr. DOWELL. It certainly has been very quiet about it, if it has taken any hand whatever.

Mr. BLANTON. But we can not relieve ourselves of responsibility by stating that the Department of Justice is not doing its full duty. We have a duty to perform ourselves. If we can remedy this situation, let us act and not put off the matter until all the country newspapers are out of existence. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAVEY].

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me that in this matter we face a condition and not a theory. There are certain outstanding facts in this newspaper situation. One is that the price of print paper varies greatly. There are some newspapers that can buy their print paper for 4½ cents a pound, others for 5 cents, others for 5½ cents, and the price ranges up.

Here are two or three other facts: A publisher is told that he can not have his full needs on a contract basis. His contract desires are cut down, but he is informed very politely that perhaps by going to a certain broker he can get the paper he wants. Going to this broker, he is advised that he can have a certain amount of paper at a greatly increased price—9, 10, or 11 cents.

The fact stares us in the face that there is injustice in the situation. I do not know whether this resolution will get the results we want, but it seems to me that something ought to be done by this House to arrive at the facts and equip us with the information on which to act.

Very evidently the screws are put on certain publishers. For instance, if a newspaper complains about the treatment it receives and attacks the so-called news-print trust, then that newspaper finds it almost impossible to buy its supplies. As an evidence of that, I will merely refer to the situation of the president of the Newspaper Publishers' Association, who does business in Birmingham, Ala. I do not know the gentleman. I simply have heard the facts in the case in a general way. I have understood that that man has been penalized and punished as far as possible because he attacked the so-called news-print trust. The facts in the case are clear that the prices vary.

Papers of the same size pay different prices. Very evidently there has been a great increase in the demand, and we have nothing to blame for that except our enormous prosperity. It appears on the surface that the news-print manufacturers have taken unjust advantage of the situation. I understand there is a shortage of about 10 per cent perhaps, and prices have been boosted way beyond reason, way beyond the normal increase in the cost of the production. It seems to me that the times now demand that something be done by this House. We can not gain a thing; we can not justify ourselves for our failure by simply saying that some one else ought to get busy.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVEY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that this resolution will do any good?

Mr. DAVEY. I have just said that I am not sure whether this is the method or not. If this does not amount to anything, may I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he propose a suitable substitute?

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVEY. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. In addition to the passage of this resolution, does not the gentleman believe that the passage of a resolution directing the Department of Justice to proceed against the Newspaper Trust that he has referred to controlling the print-paper output, would be a proper thing?

Mr. DAVEY. I understand the Department of Justice is moving.

Mr. DOWELL. Would not a resolution of that character stimulate the movement of the Department of Justice?

Mr. DAVEY. I doubt it. May I suggest to the gentleman that here in this city of Washington the best little game that I know of is "buck passing," seeking to place the responsibility on some one else?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think I know a little something about the paper business, having been in it all my life up to four or five years ago, and I feel this way: This resolution will not get us anywhere and is a waste of time considering it. In the first place, the reason for this great shortage of paper at this time is that for the last five or six years there has been practically no new production of paper in this country. The reason for that is that up to the time of the war there was no money in the paper business under existing conditions, and the manufacturers would not increase production as they had done in former years, and therefore were not ready for this increased demand.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman explain the reason for the wide variation in price to the various publishers?

Mr. SNELL. That is easy to explain for the reason that there is such a shortage there is no spot print paper at the present time. What little there is comes from the paper mills that do not manufacture newsprint as a regular product, and what little they have they can get most any price they ask at the time. Most of the manufacturers of newsprint paper are under long-time contracts to the big papers, and the price they are paying depends upon the time the contract was made. If it was made some time ago, it is cheaper; if made lately, much higher. Many large papers made contracts two or four years ago, but as soon as those contracts expire they will have to pay more. If conditions had not been so bad and so uncertain for newsprint manufacturers prior to the war, they would have gone on and expanded business and been ready to take care of these extra demands. But from the fact that they were not making money they did not expand, and then when this increased consumption came on they were not in a condition to take care of it, and they will not be, for it takes two or three years to build a paper mill. You can not start one overnight. When they build a new mill by that time perhaps the shortage of newsprint paper will have passed away. On account of the uncertain conditions of raw material and our trade relations with Canada they do not dare to put millions of dollars of money into new paper mills at this time. That is one reason for the shortage. You give them some stable legislation along this line and they will manufacture your paper all right.

Mr. DAVEY. Does the gentleman realize that the newsprint manufacturers of the country have the publishers by the throat?

Mr. SNELL. I think perhaps they have at the present time. But does the gentleman realize that the publishers had the manufacturers by the throat for years before this happened? Mills did not make a single dollar up to the time the war broke out, and now they are getting their innings. But you can not legislate more newsprint mills into the country. I do not know what the Underwood resolution provides, but you have got to have some stable relations between this country and Canada, because the raw material is over there. Until we get some stable relations and the people in the business know what they can figure on, they will not build any more paper mills.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not Canada prohibit the exportation of newsprint paper?

Mr. SNELL. No; but they have certain restrictions on the exportation of pulp wood. These conditions must be stabilized before people can afford to build mills.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the Underwood resolution provide for a commission for that purpose?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know what the Underwood resolution provides.

Mr. LAZARO. From what I see in the press it is a very meritorious resolution.

Mr. SNELL. If it seeks to establish definite relations with Canada, I should think it would be.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman said that they had not built any paper mills and were not building any.

Mr. SNELL. Not now and none for the last five years.

Mr. GARD. There is a newsprint plant being built at Chillicothe, Ohio, costing a million dollars.

Mr. SNELL. Any newsprint plant at Chillicothe will never be a very important factor in the news world on account of the natural conditions that exist in that part of the country. Furthermore, a million dollars will not build a very large paper mill under present conditions. Certainly not enough to affect the market.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. DAVEY. Does the gentleman realize that perhaps if the supply were greatly increased it may be, and probably is, in the power of a newsprint manufacturer to curtail the product?

Mr. SNELL. That might be so, but how are you going to increase it unless you build paper mills, and it takes a year to build a paper machine of the kind you have nowadays, and would take two or three years to materially increase the paper supply of the country? I think something should be done to increase the supply, but this resolution does not even start in that direction, and it is mere folly to spend time discussing it.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I have received a great deal of correspondence from the various papers in my district, and some of them are urging that Congress pass a law restricting the size of metropolitan papers or limiting the amount of print paper that they use. I am not urging that.

Mr. SNELL. You might get something in that way, but the great trouble is that the consumption is more than the production, and you can not legislate new production overnight. This resolution does not get you anywhere.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Of course, that would reduce the consumption.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY].

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I can not say very much in two minutes or five minutes. The secretary of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation wrote me a letter some time ago asking me to see what could be done to have a commission appointed to work with the Canadian authorities to increase the depth of water between Lake Champlain and the St. Lawrence River. I think the gentleman who just took his seat [Mr. SNELL] is familiar with that, and I am very familiar with it, because for more than 25 years I was vice president of the Lake Champlain Transportation Co. and we carried nearly all of that pulp wood from the St. Lawrence down to Fort Edward and on to where it was shipped to the gentleman's district. The State of New York has made a barge canal which goes from Fort Edward, where is situated the great mill of the International Paper Co.; but from Lake Champlain beyond there is a little 12-mile canal called the Chambly Canal, which runs parallel with the rapids of the Richelieu River, and then from there to the junction of the St. Lawrence are about 45 miles of rather shallow water, comparatively, about 7 feet. If the State of New York—and Vermont would be interested also—and Canada would get together and increase that waterway from Rouse Point, or from St. Johns, at least, in Canada, down through the Chambly Canal and then into the St. Lawrence they would carry this pulp stuff up for about half what it costs now. We used to get $2 a cord for it from away down near Quebec up into Fort Edward, and it seems to me that it is proper to call attention to this at this time.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEARY. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. The small freight rate of $2 a cord does not account for some publishers paying 4½ cents and others 10 and 11 cents a pound.

Mr. CLEARY. I am not going into that phase of the question. I am simply telling you that anything that goes into the matter of reducing the cost of transportation goes into the matter of reducing the cost of the stuff itself, because that is one of the main charges. I think it would be well for everyone to understand that it would be a mighty good thing for Canada and this country to increase the depth of water between Lake Champlain and the St. Lawrence River, for by doing so you could get very much cheaper rates on paper, lumber, and other materials between the United States and Canada.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to bore the House. One of the difficulties which, I think, I did not really bring out is this: A very large proportion—probably most—of the pulp wood that has been brought into the United States has come from privately owned land. People who own the land cut the wood in the wintertime, and it is then gathered up by the manufacturers and sent into the United States. The great bulk of the spruce land in Canada, however, is what is known as Crown land—owned by the Provinces. The Provinces lease this Crown land, and a very large proportion, if not the larger proportion, of the Crown spruce lands in Canada have been leased. Much of that land has been leased by American paper manufacturers, and at the time much of it was leased free export was allowed from Canada to the United States. However, it is leased with the right of the government of the Provinces to make what are known as orders in council regulating the control of the land; and, as I understand it, in recent years they have forbidden the export of this pulp wood from these leased lands to the United States. In other words, they have put into effect an order in council requiring the pulp wood to be manufactured in the Province.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. If that is the case, why not pass the Underwood resolution? Would not that bring about a permanent situation?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I discussed that resolution before.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, some time back—I think it was a couple of years ago, in 1917 or 1918—the Government instituted proceedings against seven or eight of the large paper manufacturers of the United States. These paper manufacturers finally agreed in some way that they would commit the matter to the Federal Trade Commission for the purpose of arbitration and determining a fair price for paper. That matter was submitted to the commission. They went into the question of pulp manufacture and paper manufacture down to the finest detail, and finally fixed a price at $3.10 a hundred on white print paper; but in that agreement to submit the question there was a provision that they might have the right of appeal from the decision of the trade commission to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the State of New York. When the commission fixed the price at $3.10 a hundred the paper manufacturers interested immediately appealed to the circuit court of appeals in New York, and, after reviewing the decision of the commission, the court raised the price of $3.10 to $3.90 per hundred.

At the rate of $3.10 per hundred the paper manufacturers were allowed a profit of $10 a ton, which is sufficient profit for the manufacturer of white print paper, but in the contract that they entered into as an adjustment of this arbitration they provided that the vendee might waive his rights under the arbitration contract and agree to an increase if he should see fit to do so, and as a result of that provision in the contract at the end of every six-month and every three-month period these paper mills who were parties to it have increased the price from $3.90 to $4.50, and now have made another increase of $4.50 to $5 to their regular contractors.

Now, the difficulty with the small paper weekly or small daily is that they can not get contracts with these large paper mills at $4.50 or $5. They are compelled to buy paper from the jobber or the commissioner or the broker who gets it in the market wherever he can get paper, and he buys it up and sells it to the small dealer, the small newspaper, daily or weekly, at whatever price he may ask for it, and by reason of their inability to make contracts with the large paper mills they are compelled to buy from these brokers and jobbers at whatever price they can get.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. DAVEY. Does the gentleman realize that if the newspaper should happen to offend a particular manufacturer from which he happens to buy this source of supply is entirely cut off?

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that is true.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield in reference to the contract question? In normal times when the small paper could buy all the paper it needed they would not make any contracts at the paper mills, would they? Answer that question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not in the paper business, but I presume——

Mr. SNELL. That makes a difference.

Mr. BARKLEY. But that does not justify us in refusing to bring a remedy to relieve them from a temporary situation now so that they can continue publication.

Mr. SNELL. I am willing to do that, but I want to be fair with the mills.

Mr. BARKLEY. The whole trouble may not be with the mills. As I indicated, perhaps the mills are not able to supply everybody by reason of the fact they have contracted for nearly all they can make; but it is a striking thing to me that the jobbers and commission merchants can get an extra supply and then charge what they please to these papers. They must get it from the manufacturers. I hope the Committee on Foreign Affairs will report out the resolution and let us take some action on it. It may not bring the necessary relief, but it will at least enable our Government to open negotiations with Canada to relieve this distressing situation. It is undoubtedly necessary for the Government to take some effective steps to supply print paper to those who are being ground between the manufacturer and the speculator. If it is necessary, to establish some Government agency to distribute this paper to small papers, or, if necessary, to empower such agency to fix a reasonable price.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, this emergency in the newsprint situation has been brought about primarily by the hoggishness of the big publishers of the country. It is true, as the gentleman from Illinois stated, that they have contracts for reasonable prices with the big paper mills. It has now been fixed at 5 cents a pound for the next year, but with this inordinate demand for advertising space big newspapers like the Chicago Tribune and New York Times have gone out in the market and have bulled the price up until it is 9, 10, and 12 cents, away beyond the reach of the small consumer, even if he had the money to pay for it. Now, this House should take action along two lines. First, the Committee on Foreign Affairs should report out the Underwood resolution and the House should pass it. Then we should open up the gate from Canada for a further supply of pulp and paper and tell Canada if she does not remove her unfair restrictions on pulp and paper coming into the United States that we will shut the door on our coal and other necessaries that Canada now receives from us in unrestricted supply.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And Canada needs our coal.

Mr. ANTHONY. And many other things which they need and buy from us. [Applause.] Next, we should empower the Federal Trade Commission to allocate the print paper now being produced in this country to the newspapers and magazines, both large and small, on an impartial basis, say that which was officially fixed during the war. [Applause.] Next, we should also, if they do not themselves take action, rigidly limit the size of these enormous Sunday newspapers and these great weekly advertising publications to a reasonable size as a requisite to their admission to second-class mail privileges. If this Congress will take action now on these lines, it will bring relief to the small publishers of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, before which the Underwood resolution is pending, I have been taking considerable interest in the print-paper situation for some time. Recently the Dominion of Canada, or some of the Provinces of Canada, placed an embargo on the shipment of newsprint paper from certain mills in Canada to the United States. The cause of the placing of the embargo by the Dominion of Canada, or by some of the provincial governments, was that the Dominion Government had undertaken to ration print paper in the Dominion. Some of the Canadian mills had already sold their paper to consumers in the United States and therefore refused to sell some of the little western papers of Canada a part of their products, and the Dominion put an embargo on the shipment from those mills to the United States; but the State Department, through the consul general at Ottawa, was able to secure a cancellation of the embargo. The chief trouble about the matter is not the temporary embargo on print paper, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, but lies in the fact that the Dominion Government and provincial governments had placed embargoes on the shipment of pulp wood, not print paper, but pulp wood from Canada to the United States to be here manufactured into print paper. That embargo was placed on what is known as pulp wood off Crown lands. The object of the Underwood resolution is to appoint a commission to take up with the Dominion Government and the provincial governments a plan of removing those restrictions and providing for a more comprehensive method of handling the matter in the future. As suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] we can not legislate any more print paper into existence now. There is an actual shortage at the present time and a resolution will not increase the present supply, but what Congress ought to do is to look beyond the present time and to the future and adopt the Underwood resolution, which is now before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, so that in the future we may have some practical source of print paper through the years to come. We have got to take Canada into consideration in dealing with the trouble. I am very anxious that Congress shall do everything possible to relieve the situation.

The small newspapers throughout the country have suffered acutely through the shortage and high price of print paper. Many of the large papers either own their own mills or are able to buy in such quantities as to almost monopolize the market.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the motion to discharge the committee——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor of serving with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the committee that investigated this whole situation in reference to pulp wood and print paper.

The investigation was most thorough. It occupied about two years of our time. We started in as partisans and wound up by making a unanimous report and recommendation. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] gave it as much disinterested, sincere, patriotic consideration as anybody could give, whatever party he might belong to. [Applause.] But you must remember that newsprint paper is made out of ground wood pulp, and that is produced cheaply by water power, and can not be produced cheaply in any other way. Canada has the water power and has the pulp wood, and so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned the Hydro Electric Commission produces water power and sells it at cost, at about $9 or $10 per horsepower per annum. Norway makes its wood pulp cheaper than any country on earth, because it has the cheapest water power on earth and has also great supplies of spruce timber. We are never going to have newsprint paper in this country as cheap as it can be produced in Canada and Norway, as we do not have either the abundant supply of spruce timber or the abundant supply of water power that is or can be sold as cheaply as it is now supplied in those countries. What we ought to do is to immediately suspend or repeal all tariff duties on newsprint paper, so that it may be shipped here and sold in competition with the Paper Trust from any and all foreign countries.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and pass the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT CALENDAR—REFERENCE OF CERTAIN INDIAN CLAIMS TO COURT OF CLAIMS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 157) authorizing the Indian tribes and individual Indians, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington and west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains, to submit to the Court of Claims certain claims growing out of treaties and otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at the present time?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, it strikes me that this bill is far-reaching in its provisions. It not only authorizes the filing of claims and bringing of suits before the Court of Clams, based on certain treaties, some 75 years old, made some 75 years ago, but, in addition to that, it authorizes the bringing of suit and the filing of claims against the United States by Indians with whom the United States has never had any treaty and never sustained treaty relation with. It strikes me this is going pretty far afield. We all realize that the Government is pretty nearly helpless before the Court of Claims in attempting to defend against claims 75 years old, relative to which the Government is not likely to have any very definite information and in connection with the trial of which the evidence will be very largely ex parte. The Government has some little protection if the claim is based on some alleged treaty right. But if, on the other hand, any Indian can wander into the Court of Claims, an Indian who never has had a treaty relation with the United States, and file a suit the Court of Claims is likely to have an innumerable number of suits before it based on claims of any sort or kind, and it occurs to me the Government would be pretty nearly defenseless in cases of that kind. I do not recall any case in which in authorizing the bringing of suits before the Court of Claims by Indians we have gone quite as far as this bill does.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say that this is only one of hundreds of claims of this character which are being pressed before the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has been many times before the committee, and recently a very careful investigation was made and hearings held on this particular matter, and the committee feels that these Indians are justly entitled to their day in court, in view of the fact that years ago arrangements and agreements were made whereby they turned over to the Government certain large tracts of land, with an agreement that certain amounts of money should be paid for the same and portions of it allotted to them, which has not been carried out. And, while the chairman of the committee is loath to let any of these matters get to the Court of Claims, in view of the possibility of adjustments which will call for a large amount of money to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, he feels in this case that it is justifiable and hopes that there will be no objection to the bill. And he wants to assure the House that no claim of this character will come in until it has had the careful consideration and the approval of the committee. And I wish to say further that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], my colleague, has made a careful study of this case and is better qualified than am I to present it, in view of the fact that I have been extremely busy on other matters pertaining to Indian Affairs; and I will ask him to take up the discussion of the matter.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman refers to the alleged fact that some of these Indians surrendered some land to the Government or some particular citizens with a certain understanding and a certain agreement which was never carried out. If that is true, it must have been done under a treaty, under a binding agreement of some sort; and it would not seem, in that state of affairs, to be necessary to authorize Indians who have no treaty relationship to the Government to bring claims, as this bill authorizes.

Now, we are all familiar—particularly folks who come from the West—with the tales that are told relative to claims against the Government, not only by red men but by white men. And they are found sometimes to be exceedingly extravagant when investigated. The Government is well-nigh defenseless against claims that may be set up for alleged damages and losses 75 or 80 years ago in an unsettled country, a new country, far from the seat of government. We should be very careful about authorizing people to go before the Court of Claims with claims of that sort. My opinion is that if we pass a bill of this kind, we really in justice ought to allow every American citizen who has any claim or fancies he has any claim against the Government to go before the Court of Claims and present it. If you go as far as this bill goes, then, it seems to me, there is no place at which to stop short of opening the doors of the Court of Claims to every citizen who imagines that he has any sort or kind of claim against the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As a matter of fact, in such matters as this, are not the real persons who get the benefit the lawyers rather than the Indians?

Mr. MONDELL. As an illustration, I am very familiar with the difficulties of claims of this sort, relative to which the Indians are interested. They sometimes have spoken to me. But the men who are really urging the thing, although they are men who do not appear before the committee—they wisely keep in the background—are, in the main, attorneys who expect to get very considerable fees.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to corroborate the gentleman's statement there right now by saying that in the past seven days the Indian Affairs Committee have been holding extensive hearings on the Minnesota-Chippewa proposition, and nearly everyone interested seems to be an attorney for some set of those Indians. When it is all finished, if anybody is to be benefited by it, it will be those fellows, and not particularly the Indians, in the judgment of the chairman of the committee. But, notwithstanding that, there must be some point or place where some of these matters can be wound up, although the attorneys get something out of it.

Mr. MONDELL. The probability is that we have been doing all sorts and kinds of things for these men for 50 years.

I do not know how many of their children we have educated, and continuously we have been aiding them in one way and another. I am quite sure that their children have been and are probably educated down to this time at the public expense. None of these payments on behalf of the Government, none of these things that have been done in a helpful way for these Indians, is an offset to any claims that may be set up. If the gentleman will allow me, when the Indian appropriation bill was before the House some little time ago, his committee suggested the propriety of not charging certain expenditures against certain Indians on the ground that it was utterly impossible for them to meet the payments, and at that time I suggested that if there was no other reason for doing that, there was a very good reason to be found in the fact that ultimately every Indian, everywhere on earth, has a claim against the Government, and it would be well to have somewhere a record of what the Government has done for the Indian, as well as to allow the presentation of claims that the Indians may assume to have against the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the circumstances, if the gentleman desires to be relieved of the responsibility of objecting to this bill, I will relieve him of it for the time being. I would like to know a little bit more about this bill and this class of bills, of which the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. SNYDER] says there are hundreds pending.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will withhold his objection for a moment, I would be glad to make this statement: The reason we are beginning to let some of these bills out is this, that during the period of the war and for some months previous to that the Committee on Indian Affairs considered no bills whatever of this character, and for nearly three years no consideration has been given to any bills desiring to carry claims to the Court of Claims. Necessarily now we have had to start doing business along that line, and we are only dealing with those which seem to be the most meritorious. This bill was under some discussion, I think, two weeks ago, and certain information was asked for, which we have compiled and put in this record, which clearly shows that there is some justice in this claim, in my judgment.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the right to object.

Mr. LONGWORTH. To save time, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Before the gentleman from Ohio objects, is there any desire by this bill to shut off the Government from claiming credit if this matter is submitted to the Court of Claims for money paid to these Indians or for money expended for their benefit? The bill does that?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The bill provides for set-offs.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is on lines 16 to 20 on page 2.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. We provide that—

> The court shall also consider and determine any legal or equitable expenses, set-offs, or counterclaims which the United States may have against any of said tribes, bands, or individual Indians.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That does not at all give the Government credit for gratuities. That which you give a man is no defense and no set-off.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It should not be.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The Court of Claims has settled that question.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] says it should not be. It has been the invariable practice, when Congress provides for the settlement of these claims or for the submission of them, to provide that any money that has been paid to the Indians for gratuities or expended for their benefit shall constitute a set-off.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois knows that it has been the rule of the Court of Claims that every dollar of gratuity is considered as a set-off.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not think the gentleman is correct. I do not remember of a bill that has been passed that did not contain that provision. I do not see how the Court of Claims could say that a gratuity was a set-off.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The Court of Claims has decided that a gratuity shall be considered as a set-off.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then it will do no harm to put it in the bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. For educational purposes?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. For any purpose.

Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I reserve the right to object. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] had the floor.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The bill provides, does it not, that where there is a treaty the Indian can go into the Court of Claims, and it also provides that where there is no treaty right he can go into the Court of Claims? Under existing law, can he not go into court if there is a treaty right existing?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I would like to answer that question, so as to get before the House some of the salient facts in this case. The Committee on Indian Affairs takes the attitude of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] against indiscriminately allowing these bills to come before the House. But after hearings and investigations on this bill we decided that it was such an unusual case that justice required that these Indians should have their day in court.

West of the Cascade Mountains, in the State of Washington, there were 71 tribes or bands of Indians residing on lands on which they had the right of ownership and occupation. Gov. Stevens was made a commissioner to make treaties with those Indians, and he went out and in five years' time made a number of treaties by which the Indians ceded 1,800 acres of land each to the United States Government in return for the promise on the part of the commissioner that they would be given homes for themselves. They reserved only enough land under these treaties to furnish 7 acres apiece, which everybody knows is not sufficient land on which to establish a farm home. Later on enough land to make 59 acres apiece was set aside by Executive orders for these Indians, but the Indian Bureau will not allot on that reservation until the timber has been cut. There is some valuable timber there. The result is that Indians, who had little parcels of ground used for growing potatoes, etc., were thrown off their lands by white settlers, and their improvements were taken and their homes occupied, and they have not a single inch of ground that they can call their own.

Where Gov. Stevens was able to get in contact with these tribes, he made treaties with them, but a number of the tribes in the interior could not be reached, and now the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] indicates that they have no claim on the Government. They have a greater claim than have the tribes with whom the treaties were made, because the white settlers went on their lands and took their lands from them without any right whatever, and with no agreement of restitution or compensation, and they were despoiled of their lands and their heritage.

Now, the claim is urged that because no treaty was made with them they have not even the right to a day in court. I feel certain that this House will recognize that all these tribes should have a chance to present their claims before the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have no objection to the bill remaining on the calendar, but for the time being I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. SNYDER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill retain its position on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice and retain its position on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I think it ought to go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. SNYDER. All right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman modify his request and ask that the bill go to the foot of the calendar?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; I modify my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

KLAMATH INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5163) authorizing the Klamath Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire whether there is any difference in the public necessity for the passage of this bill H. R. 5163 and S. 157, to which objection has just been made? I notice that the terms of the two bills are very similar, if not identical. This bill seems to confer an extreme limit of authority to present claims of whatsoever nature which these bands of Indians may have against the United States. My position is similar to that of gentlemen who have spoken, and I would like to be enlightened as to the particular merits of this bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am not familiar with all the details of the other bill, but there is this distinction which I gather from the discussion on the floor: In this bill the Government may set off any gratuities granted to these Indians. I am informed by the Indian Service that these gratuities amount to something like $225,000 since 1882.

Mr. GARD. The other bill provided for the set-off of legal or equitable claims of the United States.

Mr. SINNOTT. But not gratuities. Gratuities are specifically mentioned in this bill. I should like to explain this bill. I think the gentleman will see the difference between it and the other bill. I am not commenting upon the merits of the other bill, but this is the situation: In 1864 the Government entered into a treaty with these Klamath Indians whereby they ceded some 12,800,000 acres to the Government and retained for themselves 2,279,000 acres. When that treaty was made there was no interpreter present who understood the Indian language and the English language. There was an Indian who understood what we on the coast know as the Chinook jargon, and a white man who understood the Chinook jargon. I am somewhat familiar with the Chinook jargon myself. It is an artificial language built up out of the necessities of trade with the Hudson Bay Co. and the other fur traders. That Chinook jargon has a very limited vocabulary, a few hundred words. It is a very rigid inflexible language. There is no way of translating all the language in the treaty, as it was written in the Chinook jargon.

This reservation was first surveyed in 1871. That survey was admitted by the department to have been erroneous, because the surveyor instead of following the topographical features of the country described in the treaty followed the lines of the Government survey.

Then, in 1896 a commission was appointed to ascertain the boundaries as described in the treaty. The commission went out there and absolutely ignored some of the calls in the treaty.

For instance, I call this map to the attention of the gentleman. Here is the present boundary of the reservation, this black line on the map. The full red line is the boundary as determined by the commissioners to follow the description in the treaty. Here is the line as claimed by the Indians. The Indians claim that this area here was omitted. Now, the treaty calls for the northwestern boundary corner as a point east of the upper lake. The commission determined that the northwestern boundary corner was west of what they determined to be the upper lake, to wit, the Klamath marsh. The Indians claim that a point up here near Mount Ballawiske is the northwestern boundary corner of the reservation. That northwestern boundary corner is east of a lake situated over here on the map. The Indians say that that is the point agreed upon in the treaty council to be the northwestern corner of the reservation.

They are supported by testimony taken not by any attorneys interested in this matter but by Government officials as far back as 1887, and that testimony is supported and borne out by the testimony of Mr. J. P. Lee, a well-known man in that county who was elected assessor for several terms. It is his testimony that the Indians and white settlers always claimed that this was the northwestern boundary corner mentioned in the treaty. The Indians are also supported by the affidavit of R. P. Erhart, who was secretary of state of Oregon for several years. His affidavit was made away back in 1887.

That is the testimony as to the northern boundary. Now, as to the southern boundary, here is the way the commission ran it. You will see that it follows the line of the Government survey. The Government surveys were not referred to in the treaty at all. The Indians claim it should run here over to a point of rocks. Now, the boundary commission put the point of rocks 3 miles north of where the Indians claim it should be. The Indians contend that the boundary lines were run on the southern boundary and on the northern boundary for these reasons: There were a number of white settlers up on the northern boundary, also on the southern boundary. Besides that a certain road company was given a road grant by the State of Washington, and their road grant ran over onto the Indian reservation as claimed by the Indians.

Now, as to the southern boundary. I am making no charges against anyone; I can only repeat what the Indians told me. Had that line been run, as the Indians claimed it should have been run, to this point of the rocks and to the point of rocks where R. P. Erhart, who was present when the treaty was made, said was the proper location of the southwest boundary, certain white settlers would have lost land very fertile and very valuable.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. GARD. I understand it is the claim of the gentleman that these boundaries were inaccurately surveyed for some reason or other.

Mr. SINNOTT. They were inaccurately surveyed and also one call in the treaty was absolutely ignored by the boundary commission.

Mr. GARD. The boundaries could not be changed by legislation, but the gentleman wants this claim and all sorts of claims of these Indians sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SINNOTT. Not all sorts of claims; these Indians have been making this claim for years.

Mr. GARD. It is not possible to correct the boundaries so as to satisfy these Indians if they have a case of merit without conferring upon them the right to sue in the Court of Claims. That seems to be the whole contention.

Mr. SINNOTT. The greater part of this land in controversy has been patented and this land down here to the south has been patented. The Indians were paid for the land lying between this red line and here, and they were paid 86.36 cents an acre for the land that is to-day worth, some of it at least, $70 an acre. It contains some of the finest pine timber in the United States. All they will get under this bill will be about 86 cents an acre, the value of the land at the time, less the gratuities that were given to the Indians.

Mr. GARD. How many cases are there? The gentleman said it was a matter of record.

Mr. SINNOTT. I said the affidavits were a matter of record. There will be only one case. The three tribes were mentioned because that is the description of the Indians in the treaty of 1864.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Oregon think it is necessary, in order to submit the matters involved to the Court of Claims, to include the term "equitable" in reference to the claim?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think it is better to do that. I do not know how strict the court will be if you confine it strictly to their legal rights.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Here is the question involved: Here was a treaty, and under that treaty a survey was made. The Indians claim that the survey was erroneous. The Government admitted that the survey was erroneous. Congress provided for the appointment of a commission. A commission was appointed and they made the determination that some 600,000 acres of land were not included in the survey which should have been included in the survey under the treaty. Then the Government appointed an agent and paid the Indians for those 600,000 acres of land. The Indians claim that the commission was also in error in fixing what should be the boundaries of the land taken from them, and that there are 400,000 acres in addition to the 600,000 that they are entitled to be paid for. They further claim that when the agent settled for the 600,000 acres it was not a settlement in full for all the claim, but only for the 600,000 acres found by the commission to be due them, and the understanding was that the other 400,000 acres were to be settled for later. Have I stated the facts correctly?

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman has stated them correctly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, here is the question. If this was a settlement of all matters in dispute, then if left to a court of law that would be an estoppel and the Indians would have no legal claim after the settlement. If this was not a settlement in full, but only a settlement in part, it would not bar the Indians from prosecuting their claims as a lawful claim.

I am rather averse myself to have the Government make a settlement of a disputed claim, if the settlement is made in full of a disputed claim, then for us to overturn it and give the parties the right to come in and claim the balance. I have no objection, if the facts in this case will show that the claim that was settled was only for a part of their claim and was not intended as a settlement in full, to permit them to sue for the balance. The gentleman's bill, drafted, I suppose, by the attorney representing the Indians——

Mr. SINNOTT. No; there is no attorney that I know of in connection with this matter.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. These bills are usually drafted as a matter of form, and I think it is a bad form to say that we will permit a suit on equitable claims. Nobody knows what that means, and also to say that the settlement shall not be an estoppel if it was intended to be an estoppel.

Mr. SINNOTT. It will be the contention of the Indians, if the court finds that this is the upper lake, that that was not the upper lake that they had in mind. They had in mind as the upper lake a lake up here, and that might call for the assistance of the equitable side of the court to go into that matter.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What the Indians had in mind is one thing. If both parties had in mind the upper lake which the gentleman refers to, then plainly the Indians are entitled to be recompensed. But I do not quite understand why after nearly 60 years, if the Government intended one thing and some dreamer among the Indians now thinks his forefathers intended another thing, we should permit that to go to the Court of Claims where the Government has no possible way of defending its position. All the Government has is writing, while the Indians have their imagination.

Mr. SINNOTT. Their claim in this regard is a matter of record, as far back as 1887, and most of the affidavits that are set forth in the report were taken at that time by the officials of the Government.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Oregon and the Indians contend that the treaty actually referred to what he calls the upper lake.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And if that be the case and the Court of Claims should find that, then they have a legal claim?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is not an equitable claim.

Mr. SINNOTT. That would be a legal claim.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But if the court should find with the Indians' imagination that the upper lake was intended, that might give them an equitable claim that they are not entitled to.

Mr. SINNOTT. If the Indians contend that that is the lake they had in mind and the courts find the treaty does not embrace that, then they would have to resort to the equity side of the court to present their claim.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But if the court finds that the treaty does not refer to the upper lake, the Indians have no claim, and why should we allow the Indians now to sue for land on the basis that it was included in the treaty which the court finds was not included in the treaty, and base the whole thing on some testimony of some aged Indian, with the Government having no possible defense except the writing itself?

Mr. SINNOTT. There was absolutely no way of defining or showing the meaning without mentioning the name of this mountain in the language that they have to use. I know the language and it is utterly impossible to say "upper" unless you translate the term they have for God—Sahale—which might mean upper, in the sense of up in the sky.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is clear to me that if the contention of the Indians is correct, and the gentleman is inclined to think it is, that the treaty itself refers to the upper like, and there are a number of circumstances that could be pointed out that would help sustain that point, it would be somewhat analogous to a case where an Indian should come in now and say he owned the Capitol Building a hundred and twenty-five years ago and was never paid for it, and claims pay for it regardless of treaty arrangements, regardless of anything else. Does the gentleman think we ought to say that we are going to pay him for that at the present value of the Capitol grounds?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I think not; but that is hardly as strong a case as this.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is not quite so strong, but still it is somewhat on all fours with the proposition.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, is not this the situation? The treaty referred to the upper lake, and there are two upper lakes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, there are several lakes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. There was one that the Indians recognized as the upper lake and one that the white people recognized as the upper lake.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no. We were talking about what the gentleman calls the upper lake. I know where it is and he knows where it is.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Am I correct? Are there two so-called upper lakes?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; there are not. This Klamath marsh is what the commissioners took to be the upper lake and that is not known as the upper lake.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The survey does not conform with the treaty in any way. An examination of the treaty and the survey shows that it does not conform with the treaty, so it becomes a matter of construction. If the court puts a construction one way, that gives the Indians a legal right; if it puts it the other way, that does not give the Indians any right; and I do not believe we ought to leave it open and simply say, "Heads you win, tails I lose," so that the Indians will win in any event. Would not the gentleman be willing to strike out the words wherever they occur, "legal and equitable," if we submit the claim of the Indians to the court?

Mr. SINNOTT. I am afraid that would cut them out entirely from any showing of the original commissioners' misunderstanding of what the Indians had in mind when they referred to this upper lake.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no way of telling what an Indian had in his mind 60 years ago.

Mr. SINNOTT. We have the affidavits of a number of white men, and they are all very reputable.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They are all in the same wording.

Mr. SINNOTT. Those are the later ones, the ones made in 1911, but those back in 1887 do not show any similarity at all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They all tend to show that a mistake was made.

Mr. SINNOTT. They all show that the northwestern corner was at the mountain called Bal-la-wisk-se.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If we have made a settlement after there was a dispute which was intended to be in full and have paid the Indians half a million dollars or more as a full settlement, that ought to bar them. If it was not a full settlement, it ought not to bar them, but the gentleman's bill removes the bar in either case.

Mr. SINNOTT. The settlement is very ambiguous. It does not say a full settlement.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand it is not settled as to whether it is a full settlement. Perhaps it was not. The Indians say it was not. I suppose the Indian Office will say that it was—I do not know—but if it was a full settlement, that ought to dispose of it. Let the court determine whether it was a full settlement or not.

Mr. SINNOTT. In the settlement they merely ceded to the Government the lands lying between the boundary as found by the commission and the present boundary line of the reservation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand.

Mr. SINNOTT. And that is what it purports to be.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. As I understand, the title is now vested in citizens of the United States?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; to much of the disputed land.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The settlement can only be made in the way of damages or pay for this original land?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Would that be a fund the Government would put to the credit of this tribe of Indians?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; it would go——

Mr. REED of West Virginia. To the tribal funds?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; to the tribal funds.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. And not to the individual Indians?

Mr. SINNOTT. Not to the individual Indians.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Have they a fund now paid out of other settlements?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. That is used for their benefit in the usual way?

Mr. SINNOTT. In the usual way.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is a tribal fund.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman, as far as I am concerned, I may change my mind later, but I would not be willing to have this bill come up unless the gentleman is willing to strike out this estoppel business and the equitable-claim business.

Mr. SINNOTT. What line is that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, in line 9, page 2, strike out "determine all legal and equitable claims," and leave it "determine all claims." Same in lines 13 and 14. Then I come now to lines 15 and 16, and I would strike out "and any payment which has been made upon any claim so submitted shall not be treated as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as an offset in such suits or actions." If this is an estoppel I think it ought to remain an estoppel, and if it is not an estoppel I do not think it needs to be in here that you permit Indians to make their claims that have been determined by the construction of a treaty.

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, I will concede that if the gentleman insists upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this matter in the bill should be rewritten, in view of the matter presented by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is easy enough to cover the matters I have presented by amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be allowed to retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I object. I have no objection to its going to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill may go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR PORTO RICO.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11769) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman from Porto Rico desires to make a brief statement in regard to the bill. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming reserves the right to object, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Porto Rico.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill under consideration is to amend section 3 and paragraph 19 of section 2 of our organic law. There are some doubts in Porto Rico in regard to the construction of this paragraph, and in view of the hardships that have been brought about and may occur in the future as a result of the interpretation given by the legal advisers of the governor to a part of this paragraph it is necessary to remove these doubts by legislation, expressing in clear language the intention of this Congress and the purpose of the law. The paragraph referred to, as it was originally passed by the House, reads as follows:

> That no public money or property shall ever be appropriated, applied, donated, used, directly or indirectly, for the use, benefit, or support of any sect, church, denomination, sectarian institution or association, or system of religion, or for the use, benefit, or support of any priest, preacher, minister, or other religious teacher or dignitary as such. Contracting of polygamous or plural marriages hereafter is prohibited.

In the Senate an amendment was adopted, preceding the last sentence as follows:

> Or for charitable, industrial, educational, or benevolent purposes, to any person, corporation, or community not under the absolute control of Porto Rico.

This provision is omitted in the present bill so that the paragraph will read as originally prepared and adopted by the House.

The construction of this particular provision first arose for consideration in 1918, when the island of Porto Rico was suffering the consequences of a great calamity.

On the morning of October 11, 1918, a little after 10 o'clock a very severe earthquake occurred on the westerly side of the island of Porto Rico. It was followed by a tidal wave which broke upon the shore, drowning many persons and destroying many natives' huts. According to the official figures, 116 persons lost their lives, and the property lost amounted in value to about $4,000,000. This earthquake was followed by many aftershocks, several being of rather high intensity.

Considerable property was destroyed and a great number of persons, horrified by the shocks, left their dwellings and ran along the streets, many of them seeking refuge in the hills. The panic was serious and it was increased by the aftershocks that occurred so frequently that they believed a fatal disaster was going to surprise them any minute. This created confusions and excitements which contributed largely to the number of dead and injured. The conditions brought about by this earthquake, the number of people homeless and in distress, induced our legislators to advise the governor to call the insular legislature to an extraordinary session for the purpose of appropriating some money to assist the people so seriously damaged by the shocks. But the governor of Porto Rico, advised by the attorney general of the island, held that our legislature had no power under the organic law enacted by Congress on March 2, 1917, to appropriate money for this purpose. Based on this opinion, our governor addressed a communication to the Bureau of Insular Affairs, recommending that special authority be granted by Congress to the Legislature of Porto Rico to extend relief and assistance in any form and in any manner to those destitute persons who had been rendered homeless or were in needy circumstances as a result of the earthquake, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 19 of section 2 of our organic law. This communication was sent to the Bureau of Insular Affairs without our consultation, and when we were aware of the constructions given by the executive to the provision of our fundamental law, we cabled to the Committee on Insular Affairs and to the War Department explaining our views and asserting that in our opinion Congress never had the intention to deprive the people of Porto Rico of the right of helping our citizens in a case of distress.

Following the advice of the Secretary of War, the Committee on Insular Affairs favorably reported a resolution which was passed by this House on November 11, 1918, granting special authority to the insular legislature to extend relief and assistance to those persons who had been rendered helpless and were in want, and to those municipalities in the island which were in urgent need of aid for assistance as a direct result of the earthquake. At that time I was in the island, and on my return to Washington I appeared before the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and was opposed to the approval of the resolution passed by the House. Later the Secretary of War withdrew his recommendation and the resolution was not again considered.

We were opposed to the suggestions made by our executive to the Bureau of Insular Affairs and through the Bureau of Insular Affairs to Congress, first, because we think that section 2 of paragraph 19 of our organic law does not take from the Legislature of Porto Rico the right to assist our citizens in a case of extraordinary emergency, and, second, because if it is necessary that special authority be given to the insular legislature for the assistance of our people every time a calamity occurs in the island, no practical results will be obtained, as it is almost impossible to secure immediate legislation from Congress, and in all cases of emergency which require rapid action the delay may be fatal and destructive of the purpose of the legislation asked for.

The provision which we propose to strike out from the bill was again under consideration when the Legislature of Porto Rico passed an act providing for a scholarship commission for the education of 12 young men in the United States in courses of agriculture and mechanic arts and appropriating the necessary sum of money to accomplish the purpose of the law. The attorney general and the auditor of Porto Rico both declared this law unconstitutional, holding that the appropriation was prohibited by the provision above referred to. So, in accordance with this construction, we had no power to appropriate money for the purpose of educating our boys in the United States. We need in Porto Rico men with knowledge of agriculture and mechanic arts, familiarized with the methods prevailing in the United States. There is no question about the advantage of this education for our people, and this purpose may be accomplished only if the present bill becomes a law.

The proposed amendment omits only the part of the paragraph which, in the opinion of the attorney general, forbids our legislature to appropriate money for charitable or educational purposes in cases like the earthquake and the education of our boys in United States colleges. The paragraph as it will read if amended is a sufficient guard against the passage of laws for sectarian or religious purposes.

The other provision of the bill as reported provides for an amendment to section 3 of the organic act, which provides that—

> No public indebtedness of Porto Rico, or of any subdivision or municipality thereof, shall be authorized or allowed in excess of 7 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property.

The proposed amendment increases the limitation from 7 to 10 per cent, so that we may be able to dispose of a greater amount of money for the construction of public roads, public buildings, for irrigation purposes, for harbor improvements, and other improvements.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. I do.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understand the gentleman, this bill removes the present limitation on the appropriation of money by the Legislature of Porto Rico on the one hand and it increases the amount of bonds that they may issue on the other hand?

Mr. DAVILA. It increases the amount of bonds they may issue.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It allows them to issue more bonds and to appropriate more money?

Mr. DAVILA. Oh, certainly. That is my opinion of the construction. Under this provision, of course, we will be authorized to use it for our public necessities.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. I am very glad to do so.

Mr. GARRETT. The statement of the gentleman from Illinois is not quite accurate——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Absolutely accurate.

Mr. GARRETT. No; it changes the purpose for which the appropriation may be made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, it changes the purposes and it authorizes them to appropriate money for purposes for which they can not now appropriate and authorizes them to issue bonds on the other hand that they can not now issue.

Mr. GARRETT. It authorizes an increase in bonds. The question of whether——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I did not go into the question of whether I am not opposed to the bill, I will say to the gentleman. I state the facts absolutely correctly, only I put them together, which nobody else had.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, with all deference, the gentleman has not stated the facts quite accurately in regard to the appropriation. There is a question——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does not this bill authorize an appropriation of money for which the legislatures can now make no appropriation?

Mr. GARRETT. No; that is a question as to which there is grave doubt, and it has not been construed by any court.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Delegate says it has been.

Mr. GARRETT. Not construed by a court——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Construed by the Attorney General. It is very plain. It authorizes an appropriation where it can not now be made. I do not speak of the earthquake matter, because it strikes out that part of the law which forbids an appropriation for such purposes. Now, will the gentleman deny that it permits an appropriation which can not now be made?

Mr. GARRETT. No; it is very doubtful whether the appropriation that is provided in this bill could not be made under the original law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This bill does not authorize any appropriation to be made.

Mr. GARRETT. It strikes out language.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It forbids the ban on appropriations, and yet the gentleman from Tennessee, as I understood him, said that removing the ban would not permit the appropriation to be made.

Mr. GARRETT. And yet it is doubtful if what is called a ban is really a ban.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman has in mind the ban in one case. I am not talking about that. That is in the past. You can not make an appropriation that will cover that case now. This removes the ban in the future, and permits, as I understand, an appropriation to be made which can not be made under the present law.

Mr. GARRETT. That has never been decided.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It has been decided. The law decided it.

Mr. GARRETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Because the Legislature of Porto Rico has never made an appropriation under it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It does not need an appropriation to say the legislature can not make an appropriation for charitable, industrial, educational, or benevolent purposes to any person, corporation, or community not under the absolute control of Porto Rico. That was the ban. They could not make an appropriation for that purpose; and yet, if this bill passes, they can. And yet the gentleman from Tennessee insists——

Mr. DAVILA. I think there is a mistake in this matter. There are two provisions in this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know. I know what both of them are. One increases the power to raise money and the other to appropriate money.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the real purpose, after all, is to grant them a larger measure of self-government, as I understand it. They found themselves unable to do some things that a self-governing people feel they ought to have the right to do. Now, whether the court has passed upon that or not, the effect of it was that the legislature was really estopped from making the appropriation by the legal authority that controlled the situation in the island, and therefore that appropriation was not secured. So I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated very clearly the essential facts in the case. You do want the ability to appropriate more money when necessary and you do want the ability to increase the bonded indebtedness by 3 per cent. Is that right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McKEOWN. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask if any provision was made as to the price of these bonds? I notice this act provides that the bonds shall not be taxed, and I want to know from the Delegate if there is any provision safeguarding the amount at which these bonds can be sold? Because if there is no limitation, with the present taxation in the United States parties can buy these bonds at much less than par and escape taxation, a thing that occurred in the Indian Territory when permitted to issue bonds. Nobody dreamed that under the mere permission from Congress it would be afterwards claimed that these bonds were not subject to taxation, and yet large banking concerns bought all the bonds and have stated that it was held by the Congress that they were not subject to taxation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That was not a change in the law. That was the original law. Porto Rican bonds are very high on the market, I will say to the gentleman. I do not think anybody will be likely to get away with it without being known. They have the same exceptional privileges that are given to municipal bonds and State bonds in the United States and farm-loan bands.

Mr. McKEOWN. I notice that provision is granted for the sale of those bonds. Does the gentleman think there should be a restriction on the sale of them by saying that they shall not be less than a certain amount?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know whether there is a restriction in the organic act or not.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am informed that there is not. I understand in the original act there is no limitation as to what these bonds may be sold for.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know. I know they sell very high on the market.

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to suggest to the gentleman if he would not put a provision in here——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think they would sell higher than any rate the gentleman would dare name. It might have only a tendency to reduce their value.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT. Reserving the right to object, the bonds of the Porto Rican government, as I understand it, have a very high value. I do not know about the bonds of the municipal governments in Porto Rico. I think they had considerable trouble in the city of San Juan in selling some municipal bonds recently, but that does not affect this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11769) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917.

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 19 of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That no public money or property shall ever be appropriated, applied, donated, used, directly or indirectly, for the use, benefit, or support of any sect, church, denomination, sectarian institution, or association, or system of religion, or for the use, benefit, or support of any priest, preacher, minister, or other religious teacher or dignitary as such. Contracting of polygamous or plural marriages hereafter is prohibited."

SEC. 2. That section 3 of said act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That no export duties shall be levied or collected on exports from Porto Rico, but taxes and assessments on property, internal revenue, and license fees, and royalties for franchises, privileges, and concessions may be imposed for the purposes of the insular and municipal governments, respectively, as may be provided and defined by the Legislature of Porto Rico; and, when necessary to anticipate taxes and revenues, bonds and other obligations may be issued by Porto Rico or any municipal government therein as may be provided by law, and to protect the public credit: Provided, however, That no public indebtedness of Porto Rico or of any subdivision or municipality thereof shall be authorized or allowed in excess of 10 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property, and all bonds issued by the government of Porto Rico, or by its authority, shall be exempt from taxation by the Government of the United States or by the government of Porto Rico or of any political or municipal subdivision thereof, or by any State, or by any county, municipality, or other municipal subdivision of any State or Territory of the United States, or by the District of Columbia. In computing the indebtedness of the people of Porto Rico bonds issued by the people of Porto Rico secured by an equivalent amount of bonds of municipal corporations or school boards of Porto Rico shall not be counted."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 3, line 2, after the word "Columbia," strike out the period and insert ": Provided, No bonds issued hereunder shall be sold for less than par."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I do not know what the future will bring about, and I do not want to place an unnecessary restriction on the sale of these bonds. But you are permitting different municipalities and different subdivisions to issue bonds, and it occurs to me that there should be some safeguard, and if we are to give them the high privilege of being nontaxable in the territory or in the United States or in any subdivision of the United States, some kind of protection ought to be thrown around these securities so that no person shall obtain them unless within some reasonable amount of their value. And I think that where you give securities such a high privilege, even higher than the fifth Liberty loan bonds of the United States, we ought to put some restrictions as to the amount they shall bring.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. Is the gentleman familiar with the history of the marketing of Porto Rico bonds?

Mr. McKEOWN. I understand they bring a high rate, but I am not familiar with the procedure.

Mr. GARRETT. I will say to the gentleman there never has been a Porto Rico bond; that is, of the government of Porto Rico, sold at less than par. They have authority under the present organic act, the Jones Act, as it is commonly called, to issue up to 7 per cent. Such bonds as they have issued under that have been sold above par or at par. No bond issue, either under the Foraker Act or under the Jones Act, has ever been sold at less than par, and I do not think any ever will be, at least, within any reasonable time. But it is interfering with the possibility of their local self-government by putting this limitation on there.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. While our Government does not usually sell bonds below par, I suppose for fear of public sentiment, the gentleman knows, I take it, that frequently it is more profitable to sell bonds at a trifle below par at a lower rate of interest than it is to sell bonds at or above par at a higher rate of interest?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; that is true.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Because ordinarily while we have sold Government bonds at four and a quarter, usually the interest is in even terms or in one-half, as 4 or 4½, or 5 or 5½. It frequently occurs that corporations have found it more profitable to sell bonds at a slight discount and cut off half of 1 per cent on the interest than to sell bonds at par with a half per cent added and running over a long series of years. Probably that will never be done in Porto Rico.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman will also recall that in many instances in public contracts for municipal improvements the taxpayer rarely gets over 50 per cent of his bonds, due to the price at which they are sold and the contract price at which the contract is made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am aware of this, and I presume that that is what the gentleman refers to. My State, for instance, issues bonds against local improvements. Those bonds are turned over to the contractor, probably, in many cases, and there is no way in which the contractor can get more than 100 per cent. There is no way they can be paid except out of the payment of the special assessments for the special benefits derived from the local improvements, and in many cases they do not pay out in full, and we know they will not pay out in full. The rate of interest is fixed and the bonds have to be turned over at par. But we would get along much better if that were not the case.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman would want to safeguard against these municipalities of Porto Rico issuing their bonds and some concern coming in and obtaining them at a very much less value, in view of the fact that they are not taxable. That is the objection I have.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is like the other municipal bonds in the United States. I was offered yesterday municipal bonds of the State of Illinois at 5½, which is an extremely high rate. Lots of them sell at 4½ per cent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman think that that will interfere with the rights of the people of Porto Rico?

Mr. McKEOWN. No; I do not think so. We were granting in this act special privileges on these bonds, going even further than we did in the case of our last Liberty bond issue. I thought there ought to be some protection thrown around these bonds. It just occurred to me that certain people of the United States would go over and buy these bonds at less than par, and thus escape taxation granted under this bill, and it occurred to me that that ought not to be permitted. If those same people bought the fifth Liberty bond issue, they would have to pay taxes.

Mr. DAVILA. We have had that discretion heretofore. We have been very careful in the use of our money, and when we borrow that money we take care to sell our bonds at par value; so that to impose this limitation by the Congress of the United States is to go back and deprive the people of Porto Rico of the rights that they have now, without any reason which may justify this action by Congress. Are we to be charged with an abuse in the past of the rights granted to the people of Porto Rico? We have been very careful, as I say, in the disbursement of our money, and therefore why go back and deprive the people of Porto Rico of the rights granted to them? We people of Porto Rico are very jealous of our rights, and we will not be satisfied with any legislation that will deprive the island of a right that we have at present.

Mr. McKEOWN. Have any rules and regulations been promulgated as to the manner in which the bonds are to be sold?

Mr. DAVILA. I think so. As I understand, the Bureau of Insular Affairs have made regulations in accordance to law about the sale of these bonds.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. Does not the gentleman from Oklahoma believe that the fixing of the price at which the bonds shall sell, without fixing the rate of interest that they shall draw, will probably result only in interfering with their local self-government, and not be productive of the end that he intends to accomplish?

Mr. McKEOWN. The purpose of my amendment was simply to put some restriction on, and keep people from this country from going down and getting Porto Rico bonds in order to avoid taxation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman think it necessary to exempt these bonds from taxation in order to make them salable?

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not know as to that. The bill has the approval of the committee, and I do not care to be interfering with that part of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman's amendment, these bonds are not to be sold at less than par. I can not see any objection to that. Certainly, there is no reflection on the people of Porto Rico or elsewhere by inserting an amendment providing that the bonds shall not be sold for less than par.

Every bond authorization that we have passed in Congress in the last 50 years has contained that provision. It goes as a matter of course, but out of an abundance of caution we have always inserted a provision that bonds the sale of which is authorized by the Congress of the United States shall not be sold for less than par. That is the usual provision. We had that provision in all the acts of Congress passed during the war authorizing the sale of bonds. I do not believe there can be any objection to it. It may not be necessary, but there is no harm in it, and it is no reflection on the people of Porto Rico.

Mr. DAVILA. I do not think it is any reflection upon the people of Porto Rico, but I really think that it is a restriction which will deprive the people of Porto Rico of a right which they have. It seems to me that is a matter which can be cared for by the Legislature of Porto Rico. I did not say it was a reflection; but I say it is a restriction.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is a restriction in this bill under which you are not permitted to levy taxes upon exports from Porto Rico. That is a restriction, but I should not think anybody in Porto Rico would object to it.

Mr. GARRETT. This is merely an amendment to the Jones Act, raising the amount of bonds that may be issued from 7 per cent of the taxable value to 10 per cent. There was nothing in the original Jones Act which provided that those bonds should be sold at par, and this is merely a matter of increasing the amount.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was under the impression that the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] rather took exception to the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN], who offered the amendment, and I was explaining that it is the usual provision that is inserted in all of our bond laws. When a State bond is issued it is the usual custom to put in the law a provision that the bonds shall not be sold for less than par. In my State when we issue county bonds and city bonds we always provide, and the law requires us to provide, that they shall not be sold for less than par.

Mr. DAVILA. I do not think it is a reflection upon the people of Porto Rico, but I honestly think that it is not wise to impose this restriction, because it deprives the people of Porto Rico of a right that they have at present. That is the only reason.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

EXTENSION OF PERMIT PRIVILEGE TO FIRST-CLASS MAIL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8062) to extend the permit privilege to first-class mail.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear the bill reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, may extend the permit privilege to include first-class mail.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails, it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails, without postage stamps affixed, any first-class matter, provided the postage has been fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not pretend to be thoroughly informed with regard to these matters, but it has occurred to me to be a little bit dangerous to allow privileges of this sort. I suppose the matter has been carefully considered.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It has been considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which went into it thoroughly. The subcommittee reported this bill unanimously to the full committee, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads unanimously reported the bill to the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, it is an experiment.

Mr. RAMSEYER. No.

Mr. MONDELL. This privilege is granted with regard to other classes of mail?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Third-class mail.

Mr. MONDELL. That is quite a different matter from granting the privilege in the case of first-class mail. It seems to me there is very much more danger of fraud than there would be in the case of third-class mail.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course, the Post Office Department contemplates establishing different regulations and rules for the handling of first-class matter. For third-class matter the only thing that has to be stamped or printed in the upper right-hand corner of the envelope is, "One cent paid, permit No. so-and-so," and the name of the post office granting the permit. On first-class matter the Post Office Department intends to require the mailer to use a stamp or die showing in addition the hour and date of the mailing, so that first-class mail will come into the post office differently designated altogether from the third-class mail.

Mr. SNYDER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for this new rule?

Mr. RAMSEYER. There has been a demand on the part of large mailers to have the permit privilege for first-class mail the same as they have it for third-class mail. The Post Office Department recommends it because it will expedite the handling of the mail. It will do away with the labor of facing the letters, with the canceling of stamps, and with a part of the labor of distribution, because these large mailers will bring these letters to the post office properly routed.

Mr. SNYDER. In the interest of efficiency in the carrying of the first-class mail of this country in the way it appears to me it should be carried, I do not think this is a good thing, and therefore I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The bill will be stricken from the calendar and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SNYDER. I withhold it for a moment; but there are difficulties enough now in the carrying of the mails. It is almost impossible to carry them now.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This will help out in that.

Mr. SNYDER. I doubt that very much.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. It ought to be made plain, in the first place, that this will not be used for anybody who does not want to use it for himself. If you have mail on which you want to use this privilege you can use it for your mail, not that of anybody else.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not see any great difficulty about putting a sufficient amount of stamps on first-class mail.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Let me tell the gentleman something: Last year there were carried in the mails 600,000,000 pieces of third-class mail under the permit system. That saved the Post Office a great deal of time and a great deal of labor, and the cost of printing and distributing 600,000,000 postage stamps, which cost that was saved amounted to at least $30,000. The efficiency comes about on both sides; the man who mails ten or twenty thousand letters saves the time in handling them and the post office——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SNYDER. If I can not get the information I desire I shall have to object. I can not see why there is any more difficulty or any more trouble——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I would withdraw my objection if some one could show the advantage to the man who desires to use the mail and the Post Office Department in receiving it in that way.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to say for the information of the gentleman——

Mr. SNYDER. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. MADDEN. The adoption of this system will reduce the expense materially in conducting post-office work. It will expedite the dispatch of the mail. It will facilitate the business of a great many people throughout the United States. The Government will take no chances whatever of any loss. It is a new departure in respect to first-class mail, but it is a systematic and scientific departure and intended not only to reduce the expense of operating the Post Office Department, but also intended to expedite the movement of the mails and do something for the business people of the country. The gentleman from New York can not have given any study to this question, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has given material study to it. The Post Office Department has had experience in handling third-class mail under the same system, and while once they abrogated the system, they later on, after careful study, changed their minds. To-day under no circumstances would they go back to the policy as to third-class mail.

My judgment, based on a study of the question, is that the thing to do, if you expect to help to inaugurate economy in the Post Office Department, is to institute some such system as is comprised under this bill, and which will be conducted under rigid regulations prepared and enforced by those in authority in the Post Office Department, and there is absolutely no chance to lose money, not a chance on earth. Here we are offering something that is going to be of advantage to the service, and yet gentlemen who have given no study to the question whatever have made up their minds that they know more about it than those who have studied it.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman from Illinois pleases, it does not require a great deal of study on the part of any gentleman to understand something about the difficulties that we are suffering from to-day in trying to distribute the mail of this country, and I think any man on the floor has a right to at least be reasonably convinced that a radical proposition like this is going to be of benefit to the public or the department.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree with the gentleman, and I hope the gentleman is convinced.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, since I have got some information upon it, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8062) to extend the permit privilege to include first-class mail.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, may extend the permit privilege to include first-class mail.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails, it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails, without postage stamps affixed, any first-class matter, provided the postage has been fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is an exceedingly wise measure which it would have been profitable to enact a long time ago. It reminds me that some years ago the Post Office Department and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads brought in a provision authorizing this sort of a thing to be done for third-class mail. They entered on the experiment in the Post Office Department.

I do not now remember whether there was a change of administration in the Post Office Department or in any branch of the service where this was taken care of or not, but the next year the Post Office Committee brought in a bill, or it was put on an appropriation bill, repealing the law, and I was berated severely because I insisted on striking it out on a point of order. I then knew, and I am glad that the Post Office Committee knows now, that this is in the interest of efficiency and economy on the part of the Government, as well as the expedition of the mails.

We have saved enormously by granting the permit privilege to third-class mail, and there is no difference between third-class mail and first-class mail, except one is sealed ordinarily and the other is not, and the difference in postage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

RELIEF OF EUROPEAN POPULATIONS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 12954) providing for the relief of populations in Europe and in countries contiguous thereto suffering for want of food.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12954) providing for the relief of populations in Europe and in countries contiguous thereto suffering for want of food.

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the participation of the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs to populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto suffering for the want of food, the United States Grain Corporation is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to sell or dispose of flour now in its possession, not to exceed 5,000,000 barrels, for cash or on credit at such prices and on such terms or conditions as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act and to relieve populations in the countries of Europe or countries contiguous thereto suffering for the want of food: Provided, That an audited, itemized report of the receipts and expenditures of the United States Grain Corporation for the purposes authorized by this act shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1920.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MADDEN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Washington opposed to the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am, unless I get some information on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Illinois opposed to the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not opposed to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington demands a second.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Washington is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, this matter originally was called to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee by Secretary Glass, and an appropriation of $150,000,000 for the purchase of food supplies was requested, such supplies to be sold or otherwise disposed of chiefly to the people of Poland and Austria and of Armenia, where the alarming food shortage is causing the most distress.

The Secretary of the Treasury outlined the situation quite clearly in a communication to the committee several weeks ago. Mr. GLASS also appeared before the committee and made an appeal for action. I will give a portion of his communication:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: With reference to my letter of December 18 to you, calling your attention to the desperate situation in certain portions of Europe where urgent relief is required and requesting an opportunity to lay before your committee further information and proposals for legislation which will enable this Government to assist in alleviating that situation, I have the honor to submit herewith a summary of the many reports and dispatches from various reliable sources as to the situation in those parts of Europe where relief is so urgently necessary, namely, Poland, Austria, and Armenia. I also have the honor to submit a proposed legislative authorization which, in my opinion, would enable this country to give the assistance which is imperatively required.

POLAND.

According to the best information obtainable, the minimum grain requirement necessary to carry Poland until the next harvest, and which can not be filled anywhere but in the United States, is 300,000 tons. This deficiency is due to a partial failure of the wheat crop and to a lack of fuel for thrashing. Poland is at present living under a hand-to-mouth régime, which can be remedied only by a steady flow of imports from the only available surplus stocks of food, namely, those in the United States. The potato crop, which is the staple food of the poorer classes, has been destroyed by frosts to the extent of 50 per cent in many districts, as it is impossible properly to care for potatoes in transit, due to delays in transportation. Poland has been unable to procure clothing since the beginning of the war, and the result is that during the past five years practically all clothing has been worn out and has not yet been replaced. The food situation in Poland is so serious that the European Children's Relief Fund has felt obliged to loan Poland small quantities of flour from the stocks intended for child feeding. The assistance to the children of Poland rendered through this fund, which feeds 1,300,000 children daily, is claimed by its administrators there to have been a powerful means of averting revolutions up to this time, and the failure of the Polish Government to properly ration its adult population has already caused demonstrations by the Reds in Warsaw. The cost of supplying the 300,000-ton grain minimum would be approximately $50,000,000. It is possible that a portion of this requirement may be met through private charity, and that the British Government may be able to supply some tonnage for the transportation of this grain from the United States. In so far as this outside aid is received, the assistance to be furnished by the United States would be diminished.

AUSTRIA.

In Austria the acute misery and suffering are probably greater than in Poland. Two-tenths only of the present Austrian State are self-supporting in food, and the remaining eight-tenths, even before the war, produced food to supply themselves for six months of the year at most, and were dependent for the remaining six months upon importations. Consequently, the situation to-day, especially in Vienna, has become exceedingly grave, due to a shortage of coal and food. There is every indication that unless some relief is afforded immediately the population can not withstand the strain of conditions that are already well-nigh intolerable. Coal and food rations for domestic consumption have been reduced below a safety minimum, and it is only a question of days before existing stocks will be exhausted, when even the present reduced rations will become impossible unless new supplies are obtained. Already the forests in the neighborhood of Vienna are being cut down for the fuel, as are also many of the wooden dwellings.

What the effect of a general social breakdown in Austria would be can, of course, only be conjectured. That it would be confined to Austria, however, seems highly improbable, and if it spread to Germany, Poland, and possibly of all Europe, the result would be no less than a general disintegration of political cohesion in western Europe. Such an event would be fraught with the most serious consequences for the United States, and would certainly leave in its wake severe suffering and thousands of deaths among the poorer classes of the people.

The British Government has definitely proposed to join to the extent of its ability with the United States Government in furnishing relief to Austria. The British Government has explained, however, that with the present depreciation in its exchange it could not supply dollars for the purchase of food in the United States, but it can no doubt supply the requisite tonnage and some relief supplies obtainable in the United Kingdom. The total estimated requirements for Austrian relief are $100,000,000, but the British participation should reduce the amount of relief to be supplied from the United States to Austria to about $70,000,000.

As any relief undertaking, so far as concerns the United States, would be primarily a question of supplying food, and as it is advisable that the purchases of food for Europe should be handled and coordinated in such a manner as not to increase the prices of food in the United States, I am recommending in the proposed legislation that the United States Grain Corporation be empowered to purchase, sell, and deliver food and relief supplies for Europe up to the amount of $150,000,000, and that for the supplies so furnished credit may be extended by the Grain Corporation. If this amount proves insufficient to meet the minimum requirements, the Treasury will again submit the matter to Congress for such action as it may deem expedient.

If you desire further information than that contained herein, Assistant Secretary Davis and Mr. Hoover, who are most conversant with this situation, will be glad to appear before your committee on the 10th instant, at 10.30 a. m.

ARMENIA.

Although the population of Armenia is small, the situation there is desperate, and the winter season will see many deaths unless adequate food, medical supplies, and clothing are received from outside sources. It has been estimated that a bare minimum program of 7,500 tons of flour, together with other necessities, amounting in all to $500,000 monthly, will be required to meet the situation, and if deliveries are not maintained after the severe winter weather sets in orphanages will close and great numbers of deaths will result. At present there are 700,000 destitute people being kept alive by this program and partial aid is being furnished to many others.

As there are private charitable funds available for Armenia, it is probable that the amount of relief which the United States Government would be called upon to furnish to Armenia would not exceed $1,000,000.

In addition to the three above-mentioned countries or territories where the requirements are most urgent, it may be necessary to furnish some supplies to other sections of Europe (outside the boundaries of Germany) where the situation is not now so desperate but where food supplies will be required to carry them through until the next harvest. It is estimated that $25,000,000 would suffice for this purpose.

In this summary of conditions no attempt has been made to cover all the ground or even touch on all the aspects of the situation in the countries mentioned. Data in the form of consular dispatches and telegrams from various official and unofficial American representatives abroad exist in abundance to substantiate the foregoing summary of the dire need of the people of these countries for immediate relief.

In conclusion I may say that while it is impossible now to estimate definitely just what will be required, I am of the opinion, from the information so far obtainable, that a minimum of $125,000,000 and a maximum of $200,000,000 would suffice to supply the portion of relief to be assumed by this Government, provided Congress should grant the necessary authorization to participate in alleviating this serious and desperate situation.

Cordially, yours,

CARTER GLASS,
Secretary of the Treasury,

I desire to present a few extracts from statements before the Committee on Ways and Means in regard to the distressing conditions in Europe. I also want to call attention to certain portions of communications furnished the committee by the Department of State:

[Statements made by the Hon. Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, Jan. 29, 1920.]

I might supplement what I have written with the statement, in a word, that those who have come to my office to depict conditions in central Europe in this afflicted region have literally horrified me with their recitals. They tell me that men, women, and children—especially children—are dying by thousands. One gentleman who has recently returned from this afflicted district told me that within two squares, traveling in an automobile, he counted 27 dead bodies lying in the street, unburied. * * * He said that the children who survive are growing up in a state of deformity, with their bones awry, their bellies distended, and a pitiful sight to behold. In fact, it just shocks the human conception to listen to the recital of the horrors of it.

He said that those that survive, in many important towns, are too weak to bury those that die, and the atmosphere itself was literally a stench, a provocative and a creator of pestilence. I simply can not describe the imminent need of this relief and can not too strongly urge upon the committee the necessity of prompt action in the matter.

[Statement of Secretary Baker, part 3 of hearings on relief of European populations, page 119, Jan. 15, 1920.]

AUSTRIA.

Secretary BAKER. I will read this in relation to the death rate of children in the hospitals. [Reading:]

"Death rate of children, March, 1919, 96 per cent; April, 78 per cent; May, 56 per cent; June, 35 per cent. In June, 920 children were received, of whom 347 died. For 800 children there came daily 60 to 80 liters of sour milk, mixed with a preparation of white of egg. There is no special children's food; also sugar is lacking, saccharin, malt preparations, cod liver oil, etc. Weights of children are as follows: Nine months old, 3.8 kilograms (8½ pounds); 17 months old, 7.30 kilograms (15½ pounds).

"A telegram from the Hungarian Red Cross states that in the State's babies' dispensary at Budapest, which has a capacity for 18,000 babies, 812 babies died in January out of 1,000; February, 966 out of 1,000; March, 785 out of 1,000; April, 577; May, 567; June, 635. These figures illustrate the emergency and the horror perhaps better than anything else could. The figures are accurate."

There is a good deal more discussion of the same kind. This report, when I first saw it, was accompanied by photographs of undernourished children, which were indescribably distressing. June is the last month for which I have been able to get any data.

[Extracts from testimony of Mr. Hoover before the Committee on Ways and Means regarding conditions in Austria.]

The Austrian situation is the worst in Europe. There is a population of 7,000,000 people, embracing Vienna with over 2,000,000, including many refugees. This State has an agricultural capacity of about three months' food out of a year. Under the political arrangements made, the agricultural area tributary to old German Austria was, of course, separated off into Greater Serbia and Czechoslovakia. Vienna now stands as a population based upon an empire, with the empire cut off. Vienna was the financial and economic center of a very large area, and contained a largely centralized government, with a great mass of civil employees. Thus the functions of the city are largely destroyed, and we have here a large idle population of some 2,000,000 or more, together with some other smaller towns in the same situation. These can never be supported on that area except by a very intensive industrial development requiring years.

That is the situation with regard to her own agricultural resources. She has some minor industry, and if she had some primary financing of raw materials she could recover some exports and cover some of her necessities. It is possible that with investment of capital in new productive enterprise and with a preservation of the economic functions of Vienna as an economic center, the population could survive. This is not in any sense an immediate prospect. The immediate problem is that the city of Vienna and one or two minor cities, like Innsbruck, Gratz, etc., are totally out of food supplies. I doubt whether there is a food supply in sight for 30 days. That situation is of the most pressing order. I do not see any possibility of its solution outside of food on credit, and I would not want to place the security of that credit at a high point. The Austrians have offered anything they possess, including the national gallery. I, myself, said that I would not personally be associated with any attempt to empty the national gallery as against the population starving for food. It seemed to me that was a form of pawnbroking that our Government would not care to go into. But it at least illustrates the desperation of the population and their willingness to give anything they have to supply themselves with food. I do not know of any situation in the world to-day where the population is suffering as acutely as they are in those particular cities.

[Communications from Department of State with reference to Poland:]

PARIS, November 11, 1919—10 p. m.

There is no question about it; the Polish situation is desperate. Various nationalities are telling so many hard-luck stories that one more or less makes little difference, and Gibson realizes that by constant reiterating the people here and in Washington have come more or less to accept the situation as it is, and all its horrors have been lost sight of. I am convinced, personally, that the political life of Poland is in serious danger, and I think if you will discuss the situation with Hoover you will find he is in complete agreement. It is difficult to see how they can get through the winter. The army is actually without shoes and overcoats, with the temperature below zero, as you know. Coal obtains in Poland, but due to the shortage of cars they are not able to transport it to the cities. It is no uncommon sight to see people fall down on the street, overcome with cold or hunger.

POLK,
American Mission.

[Cable No. 335—Paraphrase.]

NOVEMBER 10, 1919—11 A. M.

Reference is made to the department's circular telegram of September 27, 6 p. m., 1919. It is stated that a detailed report from the foreign office shows a general rise in living expenses in Poland from 1914 to September of 1,179 per cent. No increase in the price of rent is shown. Food has increased to the amount of 1,875 per cent; fuel by over 2,000 per cent; clothing by 1,200 per cent; light by 635 per cent. No figures have been received regarding telegraphs. For the maintenance of a family of four, with one servant, a monthly budget of about 3,000 marks is estimated, as against a prewar estimate of 233 marks a month, and to meet this amount an average workman only earns from 300 to 1,200 marks monthly. Furthermore, the exchange stood at normal before the war, a ruble equaling 50 cents, a mark 23.82, whereas latest figures quote Polish marks at 2.38. A complete report will be sent by dispatch.

GIBSON,
American Minister.

According to a large amount of evidence submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, probably the most distressing conditions in all Europe are to be found in Austria, and the sad plight of the Austrian people is due, in part, at least, to the severe provisions of the peace treaty, which seem to have effectively accomplished the breaking up of the old Austro-Hungarian Empire.

The old Empire had a population of some 52,000,000. Austria of to-day has a population of about 6,400,000. Hungary, in the grain district of the old Empire, is now severed from Austria. Czechoslovakia, with a large share of the old Empire's resources and 13,000,000 inhabitants, has been taken away. Certain portions of the old Empire have been ceded to Serbia, Poland, and Roumania. Of the former powerful Empire, we find Austria of to-day without a seaport or shipping; with no manufacturing of consequence; and with little or no coal. Austria of to-day can supply grain sufficient to care for a portion of its population but for a few months of a year, and to add to its troubles, Austria's currency has depreciated to a point of almost worthlessness and is practically unable to barter for food supplies.

The real distress is in Vienna, the former proud capital of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Many of the inhabitants of Vienna were employed in the various activities of the highly centralized Government of the old Empire. Vienna also was a financial and trading center and was the center of learning of an area even greater than the old Empire itself. The activities upon which the people of the city of Vienna lived have been taken away, and Vienna of to-day appears on the verge of starvation. As Mr. Hoover stated before the committee:

> Vienna now stands as a population based upon an empire, with the empire cut off.

If we are to credit the representations of the Treasury Department; if we are to place any reliance upon what the Department of State has transmitted as authoritative communications; if we are to have any faith at all in the veracity of the reports of Mr. Hoover and the American Red Cross, we must believe that literally millions of people in Europe are facing starvation, and we must further believe that the only hope of these destitute millions is relief from America, such as is contemplated in the pending legislation.

While, as a general rule, I am opposed to extending the foreign obligations of the United States and burdening the taxpayers at home incident thereto, I fail to see how any man can blind himself to the earnest appeal for aid from across the seas. We must not confuse this legislation with certain newspaper reports of alleged activities of foreign countries to secure funds in America which eventually would be used in building rival navies, merchant ships, and industries. The appeal from Austria, Poland, Armenia, and other countries is not for the building of industries to furnish employment nor for ships; it is not particularly an appeal for money, clothing, or fuel; it is an appeal for food to avert starvation. If we are to credit the vast amount of information, furnished the Committee on Ways and Means through official channels, we must believe that the lives of large populations of unfortunate people depend upon the passage of this legislation. I most sincerely hope the bill before the House will be speedily enacted. Delay will result in suffering beyond description. The responsibility is upon us. We must act quickly.

This is a plea for humanity. It is possible that prompt relief will avoid chaotic conditions that might prove more costly to America later on, but that possibility is not the issue at this time. The real argument is the present suffering of vast populations in the stricken portions of Europe. No stronger appeal could be made than an accurate description of existing conditions, if words could be found to express the true situation.

It was said also by the Secretary of the Treasury and by others who appeared before the committee that Great Britain, France, and Italy had agreed to aid in furnishing transportation for these supplies and to contribute as far as they are able toward the purchase of supplies, breadstuffs, milk, oil, sugar, beans, and so forth. The kinds of food most essential to infants, children, and invalids are almost wholly lacking. There are no fats of any kind, and children are starving for the want of milk. The death rate among mothers and babies has reached an alarming figure. My sympathies have gone out to those poor people, whether friend or foe. As far as the war responsibility is concerned, all must admit that the children are blameless, and upon the innocent seems to be falling the greatest hardships and suffering incident to the world's most destructive war. When we know that our little children at home and our families have plenty to eat and plenty to wear, that they enjoy the comforts of life, and at the same time know that across the sea thousands of infants and thousands of mothers are facing starvation, it appeals to the sympathy in any man's heart. It did to mine. I would give up gladly a share of my food, if that would do any good, to those who are starving over there.

Later on Mr. Barnes, president of the United States Grain Corporation, came before the Committee on Rules and made the statement that that corporation has on hand 5,000,000 barrels of low-grade flour, which has been in storage for some five months, some, I believe, secured about the 1st of July, 1919. It is a grade of flour our people do not care to use. The corporation has been offering it at $10.75 per barrel, but our people do not buy it. They want a better grade of flour and are willing to pay more for it.

The Ways and Means Committee reconsidered the matter and by a unanimous report, at the request of the Grain Corporation, has presented the bill now under consideration authorizing the Grain Corporation to sell that flour for cash or on credit or to otherwise dispose of it to those suffering populations of Europe. Mr. Barnes stated that under existing law he felt they had the power to dispose of this flour without further authorization of Congress, but that if Congress gave its sanction it would enable them to call on Great Britain, France, and Italy to cooperate in furnishing transportation and other supplies to go with this flour to feed those starving people over there.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman stated in his opening remarks that the committee had been asked to appropriate $150,000,000 for this or a similar purpose?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Are we to understand that this $50,000,000 it is now proposed to appropriate to buy the 5,000,000 barrels of flour is the final word on the $150,000,000 proposition?

Mr. FORDNEY. I understand so, yes; but in addition to that let me say to the gentleman that one point I had overlooked is this: The Food Administrator has worked out a plan by which people living in this country who have friends in Europe—and Mr. Hoover stated that there were 3,000,000 families of foreigners in this country who have friends living in the stricken countries—can go to banks in this country and purchase an order for supplies over there and pay for it and send the order over there and that that order would be honored. In that way they are now receiving a very large sum of money from people in this country who have friends in Europe, all of which alleviates the task this Government in part is called upon to perform.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is this quality of flour fit for food?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Mr. Barnes stated that it was wholesome flour, but it was of a low grade. It would sustain life and has as much, if not more, nourishment than the flour of a better grade, but it is a grade of flour that our people are not accustomed to using. I really think it is whole wheat flour and is the product of soft wheat.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. It has been pretty well advertised throughout the country that the Grain Corporation made a profit in their transactions of some $50,000,000?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. These 5,000,000 barrels of flour, which are questionable so far as use in this country are concerned, embody, then, the entire asset that the Grain Corporation has in the way of profit?

Mr. FORDNEY. In the way of profit; yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Then if that flour is sold in this way, the Grain Corporation would still have a questionable asset of some $50,000,000 or whatever it gets for this flour?

Mr. FORDNEY. They have on hand the actual capital and they have on hand a little better than $50,000,000 of profit, as I understand it, in cash and in flour, mostly, I presume, in the very flour it is now proposed to use for relief purposes. It is expected to sell this flour for cash or such security as they can obtain, most of which they think will finally be paid.

Mr. SNYDER. With all due respect to Mr. Hoover, if the gentleman found himself as a business man at the end of a period of so many years, after doing the amount of business that the Grain Corporation has done, with a profit of $50,000,000 tied up in an asset of this kind, would he consider it really efficient business management.

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether it is a good proposition or not, I am willing to vote right now to grant $50,000,000 with which to buy food for people who are starving.

Mr. SNYDER. I agree with the gentleman on that fully.

Mr. FORDNEY. I agree that the security is not the best in the world.

Mr. SNYDER. It is not a question of security. What I am trying to get before this House is that this profit that we have heard so much about is tied up at the present time in 5,000,000 barrels of flour that can not be sold in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is right.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I am interested in knowing what individual or what commission manufactured 5,000,000 barrels of unsaleable flour and where that flour is now?

Mr. FORDNEY. I understand, sir, that it was manufactured at the suggestion of the Grain Corporation; I know of no other authority, except, perhaps, the Food Administration; but the Grain Corporation purchased the flour and have it in their possession now. I think they owned the wheat and had it converted into low-grade flour for the purpose of export.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman give us information as to where this 5,000,000 barrels of flour is now stored?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, it is in various storehouses, I believe, in charge of the Grain Corporation. I do not know the locations, but it is in the charge of the Grain Corporation.

Mr. MILLER. And the gentleman understands it was Mr. Barnes who had this unsaleable flour manufactured?

Mr. FORDNEY. He is the man at the head of the Grain Corporation, and it was the Grain Corporation that had the flour manufactured.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I must not take up too much time, as I have agreed to yield to others.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Under the law the Grain Corporation have the authority to sell it now. Can the gentleman explain why they want this law?

Mr. FORDNEY. They state they have the authority now to sell it, but if that authority is coupled with this specific authorization of Congress, they then can go to the English, the French, and the Italian people and say, "Our Government has authorized the sale of flour to feed these starving people and we want you to furnish the balance of the foodstuffs."

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Or, in other words, they want the indorsement of the Congress to sell this flour that is not fit for use?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I do not know whether it is fit for use; but I have no more time, as I have promised to yield to others. I have agreed to yield 10 minutes, and I believe I have now used 11 minutes over my time. Now, if the gentleman will yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] out of his 20 minutes——

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield? Probably he can get more time. The gentleman's committee first considered the proposition to extend a credit of $150,000,000 for this very purpose.

Mr. FORDNEY. We reported a bill authorizing the expenditure of $50,000,000, but $150,000,000 was requested by the Treasury Department.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What I was going to ask was, Has the committee found that $50,000,000 will do the work of saving these women and children in these distressed countries?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the gentleman should understand that if we had authorized by passing a bill for $50,000,000 it could have been used to purchase flour and other food supplies. Now, we propose to furnish 5,000,000 barrels of flour now in the Grain Corporation's possession.

Mr. RAMSEYER. All right, now——

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, that $50,000,000 was to buy all kinds of food to send over there.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the committee find that this 5,000,000 barrels of flour, together with other foods from countries that are going to furnish food, is going to tide these distressed people over until the next harvest?

Mr. FORDNEY. Until the next crop, we think.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to ask the chairman if it was understood that I would have 20 minutes and that the gentleman from Michigan would have 20 minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. Why, the gentleman from Washington says that he controls the other 40 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman opposed to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I was so recognized by the Chair.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am opposed to the bill and have been heretofore, but it may be that I will be overcome by these pathetic appeals.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is fair that all the time should be controlled on that side and cut this side out. I want 10 minutes to talk on this bill myself, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] wants 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, the Chair asked the gentleman from Washington if he was opposed to the bill, and he said he was at present, and therefore he demanded a second and is entitled to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. But I understood he qualified his opposition.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina have—how much time?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] wants 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Washington can yield time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We ought not to confine debate on this bill to 40 minutes, anyway.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have promised 10 minutes——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina have 20 minutes in addition to the time provided for by the rule, to be controlled by him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina be permitted to control 20 minutes in addition to the time controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I presume that the position of nearly all of the Members of this House is exactly the same as mine—they dislike to vote for this bill and yet regret to oppose anything that is so clearly placed on the ground of great humanitarianism. No one can read this report without distress almost to tears when one reads that in the Austrian hospitals out of every 1,000 babies for a period 960 died of inanition, starvation, and neglect. Reading that phase of it, everyone feels, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has said, that he would contribute one-half of what he possesses to afford them help. And yet I am bold enough to say that we can not by either gift of flour or money end the starvation of the children to any appreciable extent. This is but the second of numerous steps; and, once started, probably we can not stop. Not very long ago, when we were asked to contribute $100,000,000 for the starving peoples of Europe, we were told that that sum not only would relieve distress but end Bolshevism. It did neither.

Now, my friends, this particular proposition has been so jockeyed that instead of its being a $150,000,000 proposition, as first called for, and then later a $50,000,000 proposition, it is now a wheat-trade proposition, a low grade of wheat, which was made into so-called war-bread flour, and was made under regulations and directions of our Food Corporation, and made in such quantities that when the armistice was signed the mills were simply swamped with mixed flour. It could have been sold in the United States at a fair price, but what would the sale have done? Why, it would have lowered the price of white flour, and thus lowered the profits of the great milling corporations. So the United States Grain Corporation took it, paid for it, and played its part in continuing the 12-cent loaf of bread in the United States. And now it is going to Europe. Well, good riddance, and perhaps it is just as well that the inside of the deal be not aired or exposed.

Now, then, we have no guarantee just what countries will get it. A dozen of them are all crying for it, but would rather have American dollars. Armenia, Poland, and Austria, we were just told, are to get it. The resolution does not say so. I can see the scramble, and I can hear the further appeals—all just as sad as this one.

It is a matter of fact that in Austria before the collapse of that Government the city of Vienna commandeered the flour that was in the country places, sent military agents out in the country to get it, and the country millers hid the flour and refused to give it up. A new Government prevails in Austria now, and one of its principal local duties is to send agents out to those country millers and imprison them, kill them if necessary, and to seize that wheat, which is used up, not by the starving people, but by able-bodied men who will not work as long as they can get the wheat.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not true, also, that of the previous $100,000,000 we appropriated, a very substantial portion of it went to Poland, and immediately thereafter the Polish Army took the offensive, and is still fighting upon the very material we sent them?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is bound to happen. That will happen with this wheat, or much of it. The army must have food first. They will feed those armies on our wheat or our money, or whatever we give them, and they will not stop fighting, and few of the starving babies will be fed. This is a hard and cold proposition. This $50,000,000 loan, as you have called it, is not the last, by any means. What is more, that when property has no value, when life is unsafe, when money is worthless, the army offers a refuge, and that is where men go rather than to the fields.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Where does the gentleman get his facts with reference to the conditions in Austria?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have them abundantly from an Austrian-born American citizen himself, who went over there after the war and found his father, a country miller, in the condition described, and while my informant did not know all the political conditions in Austria, he knew all about the flour situation. You will not cease hearing about Austria for years to come.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We had competent witnesses before us, gentlemen who had been over there, and their evidence was all to the contrary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have no doubt you can get witnesses in plenty. I admit the distress, the starvation, the appalling conditions. Here are pathetic, desperate appeals from twelve or fifteen countries, and I will make the venture that as long as a certain proportion of the men in all those countries can find sustenance through begging it of their authorities they will not get down to the work of tilling the soil and relieving the distress of their own people.

I want to take time to say that the Polish Government has set up a legation here, with a minister plenipotentiary and an envoy extraordinary, two officials——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will use two minutes more. They have established a legation at 2640 Sixteenth Street, purchased from Mrs. Henderson for $200,000. I understand, however, no cash was paid, and that it is a 6 per cent guarantee plan. Poland also purchased a consulate in New York at 40 East Fortieth Street, but the officers do not like it apparently, for it is idle, and they have purchased another one on Third Avenue—a five-story building. And I read in the Washington Post of March 10, a few days ago, this social item:

> The minister from Poland, Prince Lubomirski, has gone to Newport, R. I., to lease a house for the summer quarters of the legation.

That shows the stretch between prince and pauper. The prince, the Polish minister, wealthy in his own right, is doing, no doubt, what he can with his money and by his efforts for the people of Poland, but he will be comfortable at Newport. We are distressed here with these stories of starvation. We will send the flour. It will feed a few. Starvation will continue; war will continue. In my opinion, men will flock into the armies in all of the little countries. So-called Bolshevist forces will fight Bolshevist forces sooner or later. It is the way of all revolutions. Distress and death for years. Slowly will the soil be tilled, and it will be years before we hear the end of these appeals, which should, in my opinion, be met with responses from private purses and not from the Public Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. FORDNEY. And I yield one minute to the gentleman, making five.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina yields four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Michigan yields one minute. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this is a case where people are starving and suffering beyond all description, and are simply asking for the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table. We have on hand 5,000,000 barrels of dark but wholesome flour that the people of this country will not buy or use, and the bakers of this country will not buy or use; but that flour is wholesome, and it is good food, and it will give relief to anyone who needs something upon which to live.

Gentlemen talk about conditions in Austria, and intimate that they are not serious or are the fault of the Austrian people themselves. If we are to believe our own people who are over there undertaking to give private aid, the conditions there simply beggar description. It is impossible to picture the horrors that are plain to the sight of anybody that walks down the streets of Vienna, notwithstanding all that is being done by private individuals to relieve the distress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman contend that in endeavoring to make more than 5,000,000 people live in what is left of Austria, where less than 1,000,000 can live, that conditions will get better with $50,000,000 worth of wheat?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman can discuss that. I am not discussing now what mistakes may have been made in the peace treaty. I care nothing about that for the present. What I desire is that the people who are now enduring this agony, while we live in comfort and comparative luxury, shall have their wants relieved to the extent of the profits the Grain Corporation has made. So far as Poland is concerned, I do not want to assist her army in getting beyond her boundaries, and the purpose in drafting this bill was to make clear that the intent was that the flour should not be used in that way. The bill states that the purpose is to relieve those who are suffering for the want of food.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield? Did you make any provision against this food falling into the hands of profiteers in the countries that are distressed?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Grain Corporation has agents over there ready to distribute this flour, and it is expected that England will furnish the transportation. The organization which the Grain Corporation already has will be used to distribute it.

The only reason why Congress should take any action is in order that England may be called upon to redeem its promise to transport the food to Europe. The Grain Corporation has the authority to sell it, as it claims, and will sell it, so Mr. Barnes says, and he is at the head of it, not Mr. Hoover.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Do I understand the gentleman to say that none of this flour will go to Poland?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. It is impossible to restrict its distribution in that kind of a way. It is expected that Poland will get much of it, but it is not intended it should be used for the support of its army.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I should hope that the committee would not want to have the country of Poland kept out of the benefits of this distribution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. There is starvation in Poland. Typhus rages there. People are dying by the thousands in Poland, although the condition in Poland is not as bad as it is in Vienna and Armenia.

My time is limited, but I want to say one thing further, that so far as the Committee on Ways and Means is concerned, and I think I represent them in this respect, this is the last time. We hope, and so far as I am concerned I pray, this aid will be sufficient to tide them over until the next harvest and put an end to the frightful agonies they are undergoing at this time. Whether it will or not I can not say, but it will go to the extent that 5,000,000 barrels of flour will relieve hunger. But this is positively the last time. We have got to draw the line somewhere, and the Committee on Ways and Means considers it ought to be drawn here.

Now, why should we not give this small amount of relief, and let them have the profits that accrued through the workings of the Grain Corporation? Let them have, as I said, these crumbs that fall from the rich man's table. Let them know that America has some heart for their agony at this time. Let us keep the reputation of being a people with souls and feelings for those who are enduring this awful suffering. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] four minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And I yield him three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for seven minutes.

AMERICA'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE FOOD RELIEF OF EUROPE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in common with others who have given consideration to the conditions abroad, I concede the hardships which the people of war-stricken Europe have been obliged to undergo, and no charitably inclined person can fail to sympathize with the condition of these unfortunate people.

To the extent that it is possible, every person should contribute of his private means to the relief of the suffering people of these unfortunate lands. Such relief as can be afforded through private contributions should be granted to the people in sections of Europe who are unable to provide such necessary food supply as will enable them to pass through the period within which the crops of the coming season are being cultivated; and my information is that large sums are being daily contributed for this purpose by the charitably inclined people of the United States, which in the aggregate amount to something like $100,000,000 a year.

The United States authorized the expenditure of $100,000,000 last summer out of its Treasury for this purpose, and, while it is said that the expenditure was not a gift and that securities were taken for the food supplied, I think it will not be denied that no part of the $100,000,000 will ever be returned to the Treasury, notwithstanding the fact that securities amounting to $88,000,000 are said to have been taken in payment for the food furnished; so that it may be safely said this $100,000,000 was a gift.

Some time since requests were made upon the Congress to donate an additional $150,000,000, and it was urged that immediate action was necessary to save the lives of the starving people abroad, but upon mature consideration those charged with the responsibility of enacting the legislation were obliged to conclude that in the present state of the National Treasury no justification could be found for such action. Later on it was stated by those who professed to have knowledge that the United States Grain Corporation had made $50,000,000 on the sale of food products abroad during the war, and that it would be within the bounds of reason that food amounting to that sum should be donated to those from whom the profit on previous sales had been made. But it must not be forgotten that in the estimate of revenues for the coming fiscal year is included the sum of $500,000,000 to be received from the Grain Corporation, and the ability of the United States to meet its obligations is to the extent of that amount dependent upon the receipt of this sum, so that it can not well be said that we are but returning profits previously made from the sale of goods abroad to those from whom such profit was made.

Any contribution made through act of Congress must come out of the Federal Treasury, and the question arises, What authority has the Congress to take the money which belongs to the whole people and donate it to charity, no matter how meritorious the case may be? My contention is that there is no authority either in the Constitution or the laws of the United States authorizing the Congress to take the funds of the people out of the Treasury for any purpose except the legitimate purposes required in the conduct of the Government, and I am unwilling, as one Member of the House, to vote to place this additional charge on the people of the United States in the form of new taxation.

It is unnecessary for me to repeat statements which I have frequently made to the effect that the finances of the country were never in such a deplorable condition as now, and now, more than ever before, it is necessary that every person in responsible place should devote himself whole-heartedly to the work of rehabilitating and stabilizing the country's finances. With a deficit of $3,000,000,000 facing us and estimated expenses for the coming fiscal year of $6,000,000,000 and revenues not to exceed $5,300,000,000, it will be seen how impossible it is to enter upon new obligations, to say nothing of drawing upon the Treasury for funds to meet the needs of other peoples. Our first obligation is to our own people, and they should receive first consideration. Living costs are away beyond the reach of the ordinary person. Every unnecessary dollar taken from the Treasury adds to the increased cost of living. Demands are being made on every hand for increased compensation to enable our people to meet the excessive living costs. These demands are neither unjust nor unreasonable under the circumstances, but everybody knows that if granted it will but add to the living cost. The thing that should concern us most is to bring conditions back to normal and thus enable those who toil to buy the necessities of life at reasonable prices. The people throughout the country are demanding relief from the excessive burdens of taxation, and those in the administrative branch of the Government are insisting upon extravagant expenditures. Both can not be granted. The duty of the Congress is to, as far as possible, reduce the expenses of the Government without doing injustice to any necessary activity, and until the people of the Nation all realize the necessity and importance of cooperating to the extent of insistence on economy of expenditure extravagant waste is likely to go on, but this extravagant waste should not include contributions from the Public Treasury to people in other nations for whose welfare we are in no wise responsible.

We have already loaned to the European nations $10,000,000,000, on which they are not paying the interest, and our people are obliged to sell abroad without assurance of definite payment, and I am not far from the mark, I think, when I say that American banks are carrying up to $12,000,000,000 of European paper received in payment for goods sold, much of which is not being paid when due, and hence it is more important than ever before that we should trim our sails to enable us to weather any storm that may arise. Nobody believes that the Government should make any further advances to Europe to help in its rehabilitation, and few people who have given the matter careful study will insist that the Treasury should be drawn upon to feed the people of Europe.

We have made many sacrifices as a people; we were proud to help in the Great War that has just closed; we are proud of these sacrifices, but now that the war is over we should look to our own needs and endeavor to husband our resources for the benefit of our own people. The willingness with which our boys went into the war and the bravery and valor which they displayed, the sacrifices they made, all prove that we were not unwilling to do our share to preserve the integrity of the world and preserve the life and prosperity of the people, but there must be a time when our obligations should cease. My judgment is that that time has come, and henceforth our efforts should be directed to a program having for its purpose the creation of conditions in this country which will enable all to feel that they are to be given every facility in the future to proceed on life's journey without unnecessary burdens, with every incentive to success through individual effort, with the assurance that no dollar of the people's money will be expended for any purpose not intended to promote the welfare and the happiness of our own people.

In a statement recently made by the Secretary of the Treasury, published in the press, Mr. Houston said:

> People lost sight of the many ways in which we have been assisting Europe since the armistice. In addition to Government loans, we have furnished them $700,000,000 worth of surplus Army supplies, $100,000,000 for food relief, probably $400,000,000 in private loans to foreign bankers, and a considerable amount of accrued interest on the Government loans, so that the total probably would read $4,000,000,000. In addition Europe has been selling securities here.

Mr. Houston said that all reports from Europe indicate that "reconstruction was going on while we were talking about it," citing the rebuilding of French railroads and bridges as a notable example of what has been accomplished.

It therefore seems to me, if Europe is able to enter upon the work of reconstruction to the extent indicated by Mr. Houston, that Europe can well afford to provide for the wants of its own people. Charity is not calculated to encourage people to begin the work of reconstruction, and production is the one thing necessary to the rehabilitation of the world. Just as long as the United States is willing to contribute, just so long are the people to whom contributions are made likely to feel that work on their part is unnecessary. What we need most of all is more production and less extravagance. If the world will begin to see that and act upon it, conditions will soon right themselves; but for the United States to be considered the only instrumentality through which the peoples of all nations must be supplied with the means of livelihood is a great mistake, and we, as the responsible agents of the American people, should not lend ourselves to the execution of the plan.

It is said that the Grain Corporation has 5,000,000 barrels of flour on hand which the people of the United States will not buy, being of a class which they are not accustomed to use, and the Grain Corporation wishes to sell such flour abroad.

The Grain Corporation was organized by act of Congress to regulate the price of wheat and flour during the war, and under the authority granted bought and sold grain and flour, not only in the United States but sold the same throughout the world. It has the same authority now that it has had from the beginning, and there is no restriction on its right to sell the flour which it has on hand, and there is no reason why it should not sell it to the people of Europe if they wish to buy it; and if its sale abroad will aid in relieving the distress among the people there I am heartily in favor of the Grain Corporation making such disposition of it; but while Mr. Barnes, head of the Grain Corporation, asserts that he has ample authority to make the sale, he still insists on further legislation upon the subject. Why the legislation is insisted upon I am unable to understand, unless it be to give those who have exploited themselves in the public press still greater opportunity for exploitation at public expense. This should not only be avoided but prevented by a refusal to enact further legislation upon any subject that will enable any man to advertise his own greatness by using the funds of the Treasury of the United States for that purpose.

Of course, as I have previously said, there is no doubt but that suffering has existed and still exists; but that this suffering will continue to exist if people are encouraged to remain in a state of idleness there can be no doubt, and so, in my judgment, the time has come when everybody everywhere should be given to understand that America as a Nation is not to be drawn upon for funds to meet their needs which must be raised by the imposition of unjust and unnecessary burdens through tax upon the backs of our own people.

From an article written by Vernon Kellogg in the February number of Everybody's Magazine, it appears that the United States has never been considered at all in connection with the relief granted to the peoples of Europe. This article is the story of Hoover. Mr. Kellogg is a professor in Stanford University. He has been a close associate of Mr. Hoover in his European work. He says, among other things:

It was a great day for the children of Warsaw. It was a great day for their parents, too, and for all the people and for the Polish Government. But it was especially the great day of the children. The man whose name they all knew as well as their own, but whose face they had never seen and whose voice they had never heard, had come to Warsaw. And they were all to see him and he was to see them. He had not announced his coming, which was a strange and upsetting thing for the Government and military and city officials, whose business it is to arrange all the grand receptions and the brilliant parades for visiting guests to whom the Government and all the people wish to do honor. And there was no man in the world to whom the Poles could wish to do more honor than to this uncrowned simple American citizen, whose name was for them the synonym of savior.

So that Mr. Hoover seems to be recognized as the only instrumentality through which the people of Europe were saved. The Treasury of the United States and its Government and its people seem to have been lost sight of in the presence of Mr. Hoover, the savior of Europe.

Mr. Kellogg goes on to say:

For what was their new freedom worth if they could not be alive to enjoy it? And their being alive was to them all plainly due to the heart and brain and energy and achievement of this extraordinary American, who sat always somewhere far away in Paris and pulled the strings that moved the diplomats and the money and the ships and the men who helped him manage the details and converted all of the activities of these men and all of these things into food for Warsaw and for all Poland. It was food that the people of Warsaw and all Poland simply had to have to keep alive, and it was food that they simply could not get for themselves. They all knew that. The name of another great American spelled freedom for them; the name Herbert Hoover spelled life to them.

Now, here we are, on the authority of Mr. Kellogg, told that Mr. Hoover pulled the strings while he sat in Paris that moved the diplomats, the money, the ships, and the men who helped him to manage the details and he converted all the activities of these men and things into food for starving Europe. They all knew they could not get the food without Hoover, and that they could not live to enjoy freedom without Hoover; that life without him was impossible. Mr. Kellogg tells us that the name of another great American spelled freedom for the people of Europe. I wonder who this great American is whose name Mr. Kellogg studiously refrains from mentioning? Can it be that this man of mystery, whose name is not worthy of mention, is a myth, or is he a real living entity? If so, why was not his name mentioned? Is it possible that he was so modest that he would not permit the use of his name? If he had performed such wonderful feats as to grant freedom to the people of Europe, why is it that his name is not to be mentioned beside that of Hoover, which spelled life to those to whom freedom had been granted by this great man of mystery?

Mr. Kellogg says:

So it was no wonder that the high officials of the Polish Government and capital city were in a state of great excitement when the news did come, not from Mr. Hoover, but from the railway officials who were managing his train, that he was really moving swiftly on from Prague to Warsaw.

Here we have, on the word of Mr. Kellogg, the information that the public officials of the Polish Government were in a state of great excitement when the news came that Mr. Hoover was on his way. Mind you, this word, according to Mr. Kellogg, did not come from Mr. Hoover himself, it came from the railway officials who were managing his train. Managing his train. It can not be that Mr. Hoover was traveling on a train and that it was found necessary to have railway officials manage it, for Mr. Hoover was on a mission of charity, was he not? Can it be possible that this man of destiny who gave life to those who had received their freedom through some mysterious great American had a train at his disposal, and that it was being managed by railway officials and that those officials, because of Mr. Hoover's modesty, were obliged to send word in advance of his coming to the Polish people? I can not believe it; for the starving people of Europe were being supplied with food from funds furnished out of the American Treasury, and surely those who were in charge of the distribution of this fund would not enter upon the extravagance necessary to supply a train to carry an individual and make it necessary for such train to be managed by a corps of railroad officials. Oh, no; that can not be; Mr. Kellogg must be mistaken.

And Mr. Kellogg says:

And now he was preparing to return to his own country and his own children to take up again the course of his life as a simple American citizen at home. But before going he must see that the people of Bohemia, Serbia, and Poland, and all the rest were being fed.

And so he traveled in an unostentatious way without advance notice of his coming on a special train managed by a corps of railroad officials.

Mr. Kellogg says:

And when those of us who went to Poland for him in January, 1919, to find out the exact condition and the actual food needs of the 25,000,000 free people there, made our report to him, a single unpremeditated sentence in this report seemed most to catch his eyes and hold his attention. It did more; it wetted his eyes and led to a special concentration of his efforts on behalf of the suffering children. This sentence was, "We see very few children playing in the streets of Warsaw." Why were they not playing? The answer was simple and sufficient; the children of Warsaw were not strong enough to play in the streets. They could not run; many could not walk; some could not even stand up. They simply could not play.

We have it on the word of Mr. Kellogg that out of the report made by those who visited the different sections of Europe for the purpose of ascertaining the conditions among the people, the one simple, unpremeditated sentence which attracted Mr. Hoover's eye was, "We see very few children playing in the streets of Warsaw." And this was the sentence out of the whole report that attracted the eye of Mr. Hoover. It did more than attract his eye; it wetted his eyes and led to a special concentration of his efforts. Mr. Kellogg informs us that Mr. Hoover, from the reading of this unpremeditated sentence, concluded that the children were not playing in the streets of Warsaw because they were not strong enough to play; that they could not run; that they could not walk and that many could not even stand; that they simply could not play. Wonderful mind with great powers of discernment. No wonder he has the ability to see into the future and to be talked about as a candidate for the Presidency, but I am sure that Mr. Hoover has not exploited his own candidacy, for are we not told by Mr. Kellogg that he was too modest to notify the people of Warsaw of his coming and that the notice they received came from the managers of his private train? May it not be that his managers are quite as industrious in the case of his presidential candidacy as they were in seeing to it that the people of Warsaw knew of the coming of their savior?

But he arrived at Warsaw, and the people hailed him as the savior, and they decided to show him the children of Warsaw could now walk, and 70,000 of the boys and girls were summoned hastily from the schools. And so it seems they were attending school. And these children were assembled on the old race track of Warsaw and marched from midafternoon to dark in happy, never-ending files past the grandstand where sat their savior, surrounded by the heads of government and the notables of Warsaw. They marched and they cheered and they waved their little tin cups. And all this was done in orderly fashion, when suddenly from the grass an astonished rabbit leaped out and started down the track, and then 5,000 of these children broke from the ranks and dashed madly after him, shouting and laughing. And they caught him and brought him in triumph as a gift to their guest. But they were astonished to see as they gave him their gift that this great, strong man did just what you or I or any other human sort of human being could not have helped doing under like circumstances. They saw him cry. And they would not have understood it if he had tried to explain to them that he cried because they had proved to him that they could run and play. So he did not try. But the children of Warsaw had no need to be sorry for him, for he cried because he was glad.

And here we have the story of a simple, great American, the savior of the people of Europe and their children, who in the coming generations are to applaud him as their savior, for are we not told by Mr. Kellogg, his close associate in all his war activities, that notwithstanding the freedom granted to these people by the other nameless great American that had it not been for Mr. Hoover, their savior, the freedom granted to them would have been of no avail?

It is astonishing to witness the activity of men who wish to keep in the public eye for legislation which will impose burdens upon the American Treasury for the relief of Europe, while no word is heard from them in the interest of the people of the great Nation whose generosity has enabled them to exploit themselves as the saviors of mankind.

I am for the bill, but I am not for political manipulation in the expenditure of the public money. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington and Mr. FORDNEY had leave to revise and extend their remarks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY].

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I am unable to understand the reason for the attacks on Mr. Hoover in this connection. This flour is to be distributed by the Grain Corporation, and they have an organization capable of properly distributing it for the purpose stated in this bill, which is to relieve the populations in the countries of Europe or contiguous thereto suffering for the want of food, upon such credit as they are able to establish and for the best possible prices, taking into consideration, of course, the prices that starving and bankrupt people can pay.

I am unable to understand insinuations that 5,000,000 barrels of wheat can be used as a club to compel some one on the other side to do what they do not want to do. The evidence shows that Austria as at present constituted is the ward of the civilized world. There are 7,000,000 people there clustered about the great city of Vienna, one of the world's greatest cities, without coal lands, without oil fields, without developed water power, without lands upon which they can raise bread grains, without factories, without raw materials. This will not be the last the world will hear from Austria. Under these circumstances and this array of facts anybody can see that the Austrian problem is with us to stay.

The evidence before our committee shows that just a short time ago a representative of the Treasury Department, traveling in an automobile three blocks through the streets of Vienna, counted 47 dead bodies on the street—men, women, and children—dead from starvation. Why should any man in this House hesitate in the vote he expects to cast on this proposition? In the month of March of last year out of every 1,000 babies in the hospitals of Budapest 965 died. In the month of April the record was almost the same. In the month of June over one-half of every thousand of the babies in the hospitals of Budapest died. I do not know what the situation there is at the present time, but if the records of a year ago have been excelled, then every baby is dead in the hospitals of Budapest.

It has been insisted here that we have accepted worthless securities for the $100,000,000 we have heretofore expended for the relief of the populations of Europe. As a matter of fact, we made this appropriation of $100,000,000, the gentlemen on the Republican side are talking about, for the purpose of investing it in food and giving it to our allies, and all the gentlemen who are complaining to-day voted for that appropriation. As a result, we have got back in good securities over $80,000,000, and so we have not been as generous as gentlemen try to make themselves believe we have been in this matter. This flour we are talking about to-day has not cost us a cent. We raised the price of wheat in order to stimulate production, and we did stimulate production, and then we added to the price of the wheat when we sold it to our allies, enough to make $50,000,000. That $50,000,000 is invested in, not unsalable flour, as gentlemen on that side say, but that $50,000,000 is invested in flour made of winter wheat which is the most nutritious flour that can possibly be made. It is salable in a large section of the United States. Most people prefer the white flour, flour that you are getting now made out of the hard wheat of the Northwest, and largely mixed with starch. It does not contain as much protein as this flour contains. It does not contain as much food value as this flour contains; but the people of the United States prefer bread as white as it can be made. That is not the kind of bread that this flour will make. We offered these prices to the producers of wheat in the winter-wheat belt of the United States, and we were compelled to buy the winter wheat they produced in order to keep good faith with the farmers of this country. The winter wheat has been manufactured into flour and these 5,000,000 barrels are a part of that flour.

If the war had continued we would be consuming this 5,000,000 barrels of winter-wheat flour ourselves in all probability, sending the whiter flour, the flour more adapted to the taste of Americans, abroad to our Army.

It has been intimated that some of this flour may reach the Polish army fighting on the frontier of Russia. None of it will go there distributed through this Grain Corporation, but so far as I am concerned I do not care if it does go there. The 224,000 Polish soldiers, leaving bloody tracks in the snows of the Russian border, are fighting the battles of civilization. They are holding back the Bolshevik army of 500,000 men in the line and 200,000 men in the reserve, the greatest army in the world to-day. [Applause.]

This gallant army of Poland is to-day battling for the civilization of the world. It is the only force of any consequence which stands between the army of Bolshevik Russia and the left bank of the Rhine. So far as I am concerned, I would like to see them supported in the fight they are making. The fight they are making is our fight. Bolshevik Russia has declared war on us and war on our institutions of government. They have declared war on the civilized Governments of all the world, a war to be conducted by insidious propaganda, by appeals to the discontented, by being instrumental in producing strikes, and by all the methods through which opposition can be developed to orderly government on this continent and in all the world. They propose also to extend by force of arms their boundaries. With their troops inspired by the prospect of loot ever dangled before their eyes, controlled also by the fatalism of the East, in which they had their origin, this great army have conquered opposing armies on every frontier, always meeting and overcoming forces superior in numbers. They have announced that Poland, bleeding Poland, bleeding now as she never has before in all her history, is her next victim; and with smug complacence the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, who are in control now of legislation look on while unaided a little army of Poles fight our battles.

This measure is a Democratic measure, as every measure connected with this war has been Democratic. The evidence which supports it has been assembled by departments of the Government controlled by Democrats. The distribution of this relief will be made by the great Grain Corporation, conceived and organized by Democrats. Since Republicans came into the control of the House at the beginning of the present session there is absolutely no reconstruction legislation to their credit. Over 60 committees have been investigating the expenditures made during the war, and in the hope of finding campaign material investiagting everything else the Democrats accomplished during the nearly eight years of their control of all branches of this Government. Republican leaders have not been looking after the interests of the 110,000,000 people who live in continental United States, but have been looking with anxiety toward the elections this fall, and have been attempting to find somewhere evidence of corruption in the Democratic administration of affairs. Their efforts have met so far with miserable failure, and they propose now to adjourn this House without even submitting a measure of reconstruction during the period of their control. This bill was reported out unanimously by the Ways and Means Committee, providing for substantially the relief it now contemplates, a month and a half ago. It was killed by a Republican Rules Committee of the House of Representatives. But when the Rules Committee killed this relief bill they killed something else. Thousands of babies have died as a result of their action in Budapest, in Hungary, in Poland, in Austria, and in Armenia; and it is safe to estimate that in the last month and a half, for lack of this relief, 70,000 men, women, and children have died miserably in Armenia and in the stricken nations of Europe. This, however, is part of the Republican achievements of the present Congress.

I am tired of the injection from the other side into these debates of politics at every state of the proceedings, and the time has come for Democrats to place the blame for the present condition of the country and the world where it belongs. The sacrifices we have made, the enormous sums of money we have expended have apparently been expended in vain; we are not yet at peace with the world. In long rows under the soil of northern France our dead lie buried, and their sacrifices have been in vain. On the other side of this House they prefer to play politics with these matters. If the peace treaty, which has been held up for purely partisan purposes, had been signed and the reconstruction of the world had commenced, the unfortunate conditions which prevail now would not exist. After the German revolution of two days ago, ex-President Taft, who is bigger than his party and who rises always above his party, declared that the failure of the peace treaty was responsible for the German monarchical movement which seems now to have overthrown a republican form of Government in Germany, and he very properly charges present conditions there to the failure of the peace treaty, and the failure of the peace treaty is due to solid Republican opposition in the other branch of the Congress.

I do not expect many to vote against this meritorious measure of relief, but I want to call attention to the fact that its passage to-day is made possible not by Republican leaders, but its passage is made possible in spite of them. Its passage is not made possible by the Republican Rules Committee of the House, but it will pass the House in spite of the committee. The passage of this measure of relief is made possible by a Democratic rule which you have not had the courage to overthrow. It is one of the rules we adopted when we destroyed Cannonism in the House, and this bill comes up now with limited debate under the Democratic regulation which permits a suspension of the rules. We therefore get it up in spite of the Republican organization. We provide this measure of relief for the starving thousands who are yet alive, not on account of anything you have done on that side of the House but in spite of everything you have done.

We have heard from partisans on the other side denunciations of Hoover ad nauseam, and we hear these denunciations again to-day, although Mr. Hoover has absolutely nothing to do with this distribution and this distribution is not to be made by his organization. He stands for it and advocates it, of course, as he has stood for and advocated every great measure of relief since we entered this war. He has displayed constructive ability in everything he has undertaken not equaled in the history of this Government by any Republican statesman I can think of at the present time. Food did win the war. I know something of the splendid system of food control and food distribution and the stimulation of the production of food products for which Mr. Hoover is responsible, and I know Mr. Hoover himself. He towers high to-day on the horizon of the nations. We produced no general in this war who comes out with the honors that are Hoover's and with achievements to his credit as great as those Mr. Hoover's friends can claim for him. With all his great qualities, with all his tremendous, almost unbelievable, achievements, he is a modest, retiring American gentleman of the old school, and I personally know that he has refused to permit his friends on this floor to make replies to the slanderous attacks so often launched against him from the Republican side. I do not propose to sit quiet longer while these misrepresentations continue.

This is a little thing we are doing for the world, and I do not sympathize with gentlemen on the Republican side who insist that it will be the last thing we will do for civilization. Looking at the question from a viewpoint purely materialistic, we can not refuse this aid and we will not be able to refuse future demands on us, for the reason that if we expect to produce in our mines, on our farms, and in our factories to the fullest capacity, or to any reasonable capacity, we must sell abroad, and if the world lapses into barbarism there will be no consuming populations able to take our surplus, and without this outlet we can expect in the near future more trouble within our own boundaries than complacent gentlemen on the other side of the House are able to see. I am not in sympathy with the statement that we fought this war and made these sacrifices for Europe alone, and I am tired of listening to that argument on this floor. This was our war, and we fought for our own institutions. We fought on account of the American dead, victims of German barbarous submarine warfare, who lie beneath the waves of the murmuring seas; we fought to make the world a decent place to live in; we fought to preserve the basic principles upon which modern civilization and modern States stand; and any other view of the matter is a view too narrow for Democrats to accept.

I do not expect that the securities we will be able to get for this flour will be gilt-edged securities. I do not expect that bankrupt and starving nations will be able to pay very much in cash, but whatever we get out of them is still profits. This flour, as a matter of abstract right, is not ours. It has been paid for by our allies, and it has never cost us a cent, and whatever we get for it of value I hope to see turned back again at some future time when the necessity for it comes into channels which will save the lives of starving men, women, and children in the unhappy sections of central Europe.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I can not make much of an argument in favor of this bill in one minute, but I want to say that I am heartily in favor of the passage of the bill. The distribution of the profits from the Grain Corporation to the suffering people in Europe is simply humane and takes no money from the Public Treasury.

I ask the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and in doing so I want to place in the RECORD some statements which I made before the Rules Committee the other day when this matter was under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. The statements which I made before the Rules Committee last week are here appended, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. LOUIS T. M'FADDEN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my appearance here is to present the favorable evidence of the American Bankers' Association as regards this bill you have under consideration this morning, known as H. R. 12193, a bill for the purpose of appropriating, through the United States Grain Corporation, $50,000,000 worth of the profits that corporation has made and for the distribution of this fund in the grief-stricken sections of Central Europe.

I want to present to you a cablegram, which I would like you to read, from Mr. Fred I. Kent to Mr. John McHugh, chairman of committee on commerce and marine, of American Bankers' Association, under date of February 20, 1920. Mr. Kent is in Europe at the present time, and I would ask the members of this committee to give particular attention to this cablegram:

CABLEGRAM FROM MR. FRED I. KENT TO MR. JOHN M'HUGH.

"PARIS, February 26, 1920.

"During the past seven months since I have been in Europe I have given a part of my time to studying conditions from the standpoint of the interests of American commerce and the people in my capacity as member of the committee on commerce and marine of the American Bankers' Association. My work has brought me into close relationship with representatives of many Governments as well as those of the banking and industrial world. While I am thoroughly convinced that Europe for her own good should borrow as little from America as is possible and provide herself with essentials for reconstruction and for existence during the early period of reconstruction, yet I firmly believe that the $50,000,000 credit now being asked of Congress for the countries of Central Europe should be granted immediately by special order. The situation is so pressing that every day's delay is dangerous, and the late spring, before the new crop is available, may be the crucial period that will determine the immediate future of all Europe.

"The British Government has already agreed to advance half of any amount that the United States will provide up to a total for Great Britain of 10,000,000 sterling advance, and France and Italy are studying the proposition. The Governments of the neutral countries of Europe have in several instances already signified their desire to consider taking part in extending help, provided the United States will do so, and there is good reason to believe that practically all may come in. Prompt and favorable action by Congress will therefore release a large fund that should go far toward enabling the reconstruction of industry, which will make it possible for the countries aided to help themselves. Should all of the nations interested join in the plan, it is intended that a proper proportion of raw materials and food will be purchased, and the mistake of feeding people without giving them something to enable them to earn their living at the same time will not be made.

"The funds advanced by each nation will be expended for goods and service furnished by its own nationals. It would seem a great pity for our country, which has done so much, to risk losing the results of their past action by failing to meet the needs of the present hour. American interests in this movement through American trade and American need for peace throughout the world are just as great as those of the European nations which are ready to take part upon American initiative, even though their economic position has been seriously disorganized.

"The food in Austria to-day, together with all supplies which it has been possible to purchase that are arriving, will feed the people to about March 15. Certain food supplies that are available, if shipped immediately from their present locations, can reach Austria in time, provided Congress acts immediately. Knowing the country (America) from ocean to ocean, I am certain that the hearts of the people are right, and that they would rise to meet any human emergency that they felt required their help, regardless of their personal interests. But in the present emergency there is not time to wage a campaign of education, and it would seem necessary, therefore, for America to accept the statement of their European representatives of to-day, governmental and commercial, for various associations and personal, who are familiar with the situation and who unanimously agree that the loan should be made. On the strength of such representation, I believe Congress should be asked to abandon everything else for the hour necessary to pass this appropriation immediately. The real need is now—to-morrow may be too late."

Mr. Kent adds he believes it is important that this matter should be given the widest possible publicity.

Following presentation by the commerce and marine committee, the administrative committee of the American Bankers' Association passed a resolution January 23 urging upon Congress the appropriating of necessary sums from available funds to be used, under proper supervision, for the purchase of food, on credit, for hungry peoples in Central Europe, outside of Germany, and in Armenia.

I also wish to present the following resolution, which was adopted January 13, 1920, by the executive committee of the committee on commerce and marine of the American Bankers' Association:

"Be it resolved by the executive committee of the committee on commerce and marine of the American Bankers' Association, That the attention of the administrative committee of the association be called to the food emergency in countries of Central Europe, outside of Germany, and in Armenia: And be it further

"Resolved, That in view of this emergency, the administrative committee of the American Bankers' Association be requested to consider the advisability of immediately urging upon Congress the appropriation from funds available for the purpose of necessary sums to be used by the United States Grain Corporation, or other suitable designated agency, for the purchase and transportation to the countries of Central Europe, outside of Germany, and in Armenia, where famine is imminent, of food supplies and other necessaries of life; such supplies and necessaries to be sold on credit to the governments of said countries, the United States Grain Corporation, or other suitable designated agency, also being authorized so to regulate the distribution of such supplies and necessaries as most effectively to provide for the prompt and sufficient relief of the population in need."

Also the following resolution adopted January 23, 1920, by the administrative committee of the American Bankers' Association:

"Resolved, That the administrative committee of the American Bankers' Association, after considering resolutions on the subject presented to it by the executive committee of the committee of the commerce and marine committee of the association, recommends to Congress the appropriation from funds available for the purpose, of necessary sums to be used by the United States Grain Corporation, or other suitable designated agency, for the purchase and transportation to the countries of Central Europe, outside of Germany, and to Armenia, where famine is imminent, of food supplies and other necessaries of life, such supplies and necessaries to be sold on credit, properly safeguarded, to the governments of said countries, the United States Grain Corporation, or other suitable designated agency, also being authorized so to regulate the distribution of such supplies and necessaries as most effectively to provide for the prompt and sufficient relief of the population in need: And be it further

"Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to the congressional committee, or committees, before which the matter of such appropriation has come, or may properly come."

Mr. FESS. Tell us, please, what the American Bankers' Association is?

Mr. McFADDEN. The American Bankers' Association is the national association in the United States of the bankers; it has a total membership of about 30,000 banking institutions.

Mr. RODENBERG. National banks?

Mr. McFADDEN. National and State banks all over the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. These bankers are in the money-loaning business; how much money are they loaning?

Mr. MCFADDEN. The bankers of this country have performed an heroic task during the war.

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking has this Bankers' Association undertaken any plan to loan money to enable these people to get on their feet?

Mr. MCFADDEN. The American Bankers' Association, as an association, is making almost daily recommendations for the relief of this situation in Europe and individual and groups of bankers are loaning money. In regard to this $50,000,000 loan, I am heartily in favor of using this money made by the Grain Corporation in their business and which represents the profit of the business they have handled, a large portion of which our own people have paid.

Mr. FESS. Have you looked into this charge against the Grain Corporation that was made two or three days ago at Spokane?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I have not; I had not heard of it until you mentioned it this morning.

Mr. FESS. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the findings of the grand jury. I do not think that should interfere with anything that should be done legitimately.

Mr. MCFADDEN. My argument is that the Grain Corporation made this profit, which they should never have made, and no better use can be made of it now than to help these people in central Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. These resolutions of the American Bankers' Association, how were they adopted?

Mr. MCFADDEN. At a meeting of the administrative committee of the American Bankers' Association and a meeting of the executive committee, and this cablegram from Mr. Kent was sent to the committee and handed over to me to present to this committee.

Mr. FESS. Do you have any knowledge of obligations by Europe to the bankers of this country?

Mr. MCFADDEN. There is a list published recently by the Treasury Department in which they attempted to show that.

Mr. FESS. Is it large?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Somewhere between three and five billion dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. Europe owes American bankers from three to five billion dollars?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Yes, sir. Bankers and investors.

The CHAIRMAN. Could it be that the bankers are interested in putting Europe in condition to repay this loan rather than have them hampered by their home charities?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I think the bankers are looking at it from a purely American standpoint. We should help Europe help itself; we can not expect central Europe to repay us for a long time; they have got to be maintained, got to have food and clothing; it is most imperative that they should have help in order to eventually help themselves.

Mr. FESS. You have been a Member of Congress and a member of congressional committees for a long time; do you think we ought to enter on a policy of this kind?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I think in this instance that we should do this. I do not want to say anything about the distribution, because I do not know whether the Grain Corporation is the proper institution for this to be distributed through or not.

Mr. FESS. That is not what I want. What I am after is, are we to set out now on a policy of taking care of suffering Europe; if so, when will it end?

Mr. MCFADDEN. That is a pretty hard question. I think, however, there is a certain obligation now to do this much, inasmuch as we have entered in and are so affected that the good effect of what we have done in the past may be destroyed by neglect at this crucial moment, with relief needed now that will rehabilitate these people. It seems to me that in order to save the situation, which seems to be a desperate one from the information I have gotten from Mr. Kent and other sources, it seems to me crucial at this time.

Mr. RODENBERG. Approximately how many people in that district over there?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Practically the whole of Poland and all these central European countries. There is all kinds of disease prevalent, and my understanding is that all children under five years of age have died.

Mr. FESS. Did you notice Hamilton Fish's statement the other day, in which he stated that this was altruistic folly? Is he a man whose judgment can be taken in matters of this kind?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I could not say.

Mr. RODENBERG. He says this proposition is altruistic folly?

Mr. FESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCFADDEN. My judgment is that this matter is imperative to the future best interests of this country in a commercial way, if you must put it on that basis, to serve our selfish interests. Very rapidly England, France, and other countries are absorbing and getting into the best trade channels of that part of Europe, and as a result the United States is going to get left out in the cold.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. MCFADDEN, it strikes me that if this idea could be entertained at all it must be on the presumption that it is a charity that is immediately demanded, and if it appears that all this is propaganda growing out of the necessity of the American bankers who have made up loans to help get Europe——

Mr. MCFADDEN. I think the American Bankers' Association look at this from purely an American standpoint—that of giving relief to the suffering people of central Europe, and with the hope that when they recover they will pay back the loan and entertain good will toward America.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, it is peculiarly fitting that the United States of America should extend the right hand of fellowship to the new Republic of Poland and extend to the suffering people of that country the most generous sympathy and aid.

Before the United States was a republic, Polish valor and Polish aspiration for freedom were woven into the very fiber of our country's struggles for national life, and the achievements of Kosciusko, Pulaski, and their Polish brothers for the cause of freedom in America are written on the brightest pages of American history.

On every battle field of America, in every war that our country has ever fought, the sons of Poland have been in the foremost lines of the fighting, and everywhere in the world where liberty has fought against oppression and tyranny the Pole has fought and died in the sacred cause which has been his ideal for centuries past.

In no country in the world has freedom had more ardent adherents, and in no country has there been a more persistent, unswerving devotion to the principles of pure democracy than in Poland; and, although ground under the heels of three autocracies for centuries, her people never lost sight of her ideals. Exiled from their homes, they carried into strange lands their hopes of an ultimate regeneration of their national life. In the prisons and mines of Siberia they kept alive their unconquerable courage.

When the Great War came it found their sons forced to fight against their brothers; but everywhere in the world where a Pole could join the armies of democracy and fight for the same principles for which Kosciusko and Pulaski laid down their lives he did.

Poland was the battle ground of the East in the Great War. Overrun by both the German and Russian armies, the signing of the armistice found this devoted land desolate beyond all description. Its fields laid waste, its cities ravaged, and its people reduced to abject poverty and want, Paderewski was forced to state: "No children under 10 are left alive in the war zone, and there are no classes left in Poland. There is now only one class—the poor."

But in spite of these untold sufferings, in spite of want and hunger and suffering, this heroic race, strong in moral fiber beyond belief, remained steadfast in their belief in democracy; and out of the chaos of the frightful cataclysm in which the land had been plunged the Poles refused to be lured into the fantastic vagaries of Bolshevism or the bloody radicalism that has engulfed Russia, and we have seen the new Republic of Poland emerge from the conflict a constitutional Republic, founded on the solid rock of liberty and equality and dedicated to the same great principles enunciated by the fathers of our own Republic.

Poland's success or failure will mean the triumph or defeat of constitutional democracy in Europe in the next century.

With Poland a prosperous and successful Republic, where all men can live with equal opportunity and equal liberty, the possibility of a reaction to autocracy will be forever eliminated and the bewildering fogs of social disorder will fade away in the bright sunlight of freedom in this land that has waited so long, suffered so much, and fought so valiantly for all that American hearts hold dear in human aspiration.

Let us then help Poland without stint. Let us do our utmost for this, our sister Republic, and other lands and other races striving to cast off the fetters of tyranny and the yoke of the oppressor will know that Columbia is always ready to aid the cause of righteous freedom and give of her abundant treasure to those who need her help.

The armies and people of Poland are standing between civilization and barbarism. They are fighting for our preservation. They are suffering for want of food. They are enduring untold agonies of mind and body, and it is but a small thing for us to send to them these 5,000,000 barrels of flour. May God grant that it may to some extent alleviate their sufferings.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the bill now before us is not the bill that was reported by the Ways and Means Committee which was before the Rules Committee. That bill carried a further extension of Government credit, which already reaches $10,000,000,000, upon which not a cent has yet been paid. This bill does not place any obligation upon the Treasury, but is simply to dispose of a quantity of flour held now by the Grain Corporation which can not be disposed of in this country, according to the statement of Mr. Barnes, and the bill is the result of his testimony before the Rules Committee. He said not a word about feeding Europe, but to save the flour from spoiling. Very few people will object to the sale of what we now have in possession, stated to be 5,000,000 barrels, because he stated distinctly that if it is not sold it will spoil when the warm weather comes. He also stated that he had the authority to sell it now, and he also asserts he will sell it, whether authorized or not.

From the beginning I have resisted the further extension of Government credits to Europe as a most dangerous step, already conceded by this country. I shall persist in my resistance. Europe's situation will not be restored so long as she can look to us for credit. We have got to the point where certainly we must stop that procedure, not only for Europe's sake but for the security of our own Nation. There is not a responsible thinker in America who does not agree with that proposition. The Reserve Board has sounded the warning. This Congress senses the danger. The one solution for Europe is to be compelled to go to work. She will not do so while she can depend upon other countries to provide for her. Whether they are suffering there or not is not questioned. But the extension of Government loans is not the proper method for us. The proper method by which that suffering can be relieved by this country is not governmental. It is by the altruism displayed by our united charities, where our gifts can be administered as in the various war agencies which poured into Europe our gratuities. Anyone who can not see the difference between contributing his own available reserves to be distributed by the Red Cross or other charitable institutions to salvage Europe's suffering people and voting out of the Treasury of the United States money that is not ours to distribute simply can not see the difference between a gift of my own money and a gift of the people's money that we hold in trust. I will join any group of citizens to give to assist Europe, but I can not vote out of the Treasury the people's money, which is not mine to give.

We have been told in the statements of Mr. Ribot, of France, a most distinguished thinker and statesman, that we must pay our portion of the war debt, and Mr. Stearnes, of France, also demands it. George Clemenceau wanted an early session of the league to internationalize the war debt.

We are told that we will not only be called upon to cancel our $10,000,000,000 that Europe owes us, but we will be called upon to make further contributions in order to make up our share of our obligation when they have internationalized the war debt. This comes from no less a figure than Keynes, the British treasury's representative at the peace conference and the deputy of the chancellor of the exchequer on the supreme economic council in Paris. That is the problem now before us. I now say to you, gentlemen of this House, we must take the position now whether we propose to enter upon a policy to feed Europe's poor. If so, then let it be done with our eyes open to the fact that it will be only the beginning, for the suffering will continue. Is it safe to allow our feelings to overcome our judgment? We can not legislate under sob speeches. We must think with our brains rather than with our emotions when we are planning a permanent policy of international significance for the future. We must realize that if we stay out of the vortex into which Europe is plunged, where her paper currency is expressed in high prices and demoralized exchanges, then we must not go on extending our credit to countries that have no hesitancy in making requests in the belief that we owe it to them as a part of our debt and ask without limit because they believe we will grant it. They can afford to ask it because they argue that they should not have to pay it until we have contributed what they claim is our share of the war debt.

Keynes, the British spokesman, declares that cancellation of Europe's debt "would be an act of generosity for which Europe can fairly ask, provided that Europe is making an honorable attempt in other directions not to continue war," and so forth. He further says "if Europe is going to repay the $10,000,000,000 worth of financial assistance which she has had from the United States with compound interest at 5 per cent, then the matter takes on quite a different complexion. If America's advances are to be regarded in this light, her relative financial sacrifices are very light, indeed."

Let those who are moved by the proponents of further Government credit read carefully the seventh chapter of "Economic Consequences of the Peace," by this British author, and then decide their duty in the premises.

In regard to assisting suffering Europe and contiguous countries, no people ever displayed greater altruism than our people. They are doing it now. Millions of dollars are being sent every month. That is most commendable, and will be, as it should be, continued. But this is no ground for demanding of this Congress continuance of Government loans to Europe.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This bill says it is to be distributed to various countries. It has been stated here that there are three countries—Armenia, Poland, and Austria. The fact is that this $50,000,000 will probably be just a drop in the bucket, and that there will be at least 15 countries that will be making demands upon us.

Mr. FESS. Certainly, there will be further demands, and the attitude of men in the House stimulates hope for indefinite demands upon the Government. If we extend further Government credit to Europe, there will be another demand that we increase it, and it will come within four months. The same argument to which we now listen we will be compelled to listen again. I am willing to vote to give authority to the Grain Corporation to dispose of the flour it now has in its possession which Mr. Barnes claims will spoil and which he says he has already authority to sell, but would prefer that the Government give him the moral support. I see no real reason for not granting him this support if he wishes us to do so. I confess I do not understand why the price of flour is rising with such surplus on hand. However, I am in favor of selling to Europe for cash or on credit the flour of which we are possessed and which Mr. Barnes declares he can not sell here in America. But I warn you that Europe will demand from this Congress a further extension of Government credit upon the basis of our duty to further share in the war debt, and we must respect that warning. I am through with it, so far as my influence will go.

We have taken many steps to assist Europe. February 4 the Treasury Department made the following statement on the international financial situation:

The international financial situation is one of great importance. * * * Since armistice the United States has advanced to Governments of Allies, as of close of business October 31, 1919, sum of $2,329,257,138.55, and there remained on that date an unexpended balance of $593,628,111.45 from total loans of $10,000,000,000 authorized under Liberty loan acts. Treasury asked and obtained power for War Finance Corporation to make advances up to amount of $1,000,000,000 for nonwar purposes, and War Finance Corporation is prepared to make such advances. By act approved September 17, 1919, Federal Reserve Board is authorized to permit, until January 1, 1921, national banks to invest to limited extent in stock of American corporations principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate exports. Secretary of War is authorized to sell surplus Army stores on credit. United States Wheat Director is authorized to sell wheat to Europe on credit. The power which at present exists in the Government or governmental agencies to assist in meeting Europe's financial needs is therefore considerable. * * * The Treasury is considering with representatives of Governments of the Allies the funding of the demand obligations which United States holds into long-time obligations, and at same time the funding during the reconstruction period, or, say, for a period of two or three years, of the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by United States under Liberty loan acts. The Treasury believes that the need of Europe for financial assistance, very great and very real though it is, has been much exaggerated both here and abroad. * * *

This shows that the present resolution is unnecessary.

The European situation is not so bad as published. I submit the following from the Chronicle:

NEED FOR LOAN TO EUROPE CLAIMED TO BE EXAGGERATED.

Stating that "the need for American loans to Europe has been tremendously exaggerated in this country, judging from the actual course of European trade in recent months," the "American Exporter," in its issue of January 19, says:

"For months alarmists have reiterated the statement that only huge loans from us would save Europe from disaster, restore her trade and industry, and permit her to continue importing American merchandise.

"Here are some of the facts which refute pessimistic predictions frequently made in recent months:

"In the 11 months ended November 30 our exports to markets other than Europe increased in value over the same period a year ago by 19 per cent, but our exports to Europe increased in value by 36 per cent.

"For the single month of November, the latest figures available, the gain to markets other than Europe was 11 per cent over last year, but the gain to Europe was no less than 64 per cent.

"Our exports to the allied nations in the 11 months ended November were not only greater in value than last year but were far greater than the entire year's exports to all the world for any year prior to the war.

"When the armistice was signed our trade with the Allies was so one-sided that Great Britain's purchases from us were eighteen times as much as her sales to us, those to France eighteen times, and those of Italy over fifty times as much.

"Now Great Britain is only buying from us five times as much as she sells us, France slightly less than four times as much, and Italy the same. This reduction is due not a falling off in our exports, for the exports to these countries have increased, but to a very marked increase in the importations from Europe, made possible by the recovery of trade and industry abroad.

"Another significant fact is that from the time we entered the war until December 1 we have actually loaned to Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Italy, through Government advances or publicly marketed loans, more than enough to offset the collective adverse trade balance against them for the same period.

United States trade with and loans to Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Italy, Apr. 1, 1917, to Nov. 30, 1919.

Exports from United States	$9,768,071,839
Imports by United States	881,479,599
Excess of exports	8,886,592,240
Loans by United States	9,656,521,649
Excess of loans and imports over exports	769,929,409

Twenty-nine per cent of the exports to the United States are now taken by Great Britain and 41 per cent of our exports are now taken by the British Empire. The condition of Great Britain is, therefore, the most important single influence upon our export trade.

Perhaps the most significant illustration of the strength of Great Britain's present position is the fact that in December, 1919, she was exporting goods to the value of 68 per cent of her imports, while during the calendar year 1919 Great Britain exported goods at the rate of 59 per cent of her imports, only 40 per cent in 1918, 56 per cent in 1915, 75 per cent in 1914, and 82 per cent in 1913, which was also the average for the three years before the war.

Great Britain's exports per capita in 1919 amount to $101.51, exceeding by $38.87, or more than 62 per cent, her per capita exports in 1913; but what is even more remarkable, they exceeded by over 41 per cent those of the United States, which, as calculated from our 11 month's trade, amount to $72,48.

For some time past alarmists freely predicted that the unfavorable situation with respect to foreign exchange would cause a drastic reduction of Great Britain's imports.

Despite these predictions British imports in December, 1919, were 10 per cent greater than the previous high record for the year. Moreover, during the year 1919 the greatest increase in Great Britain's imports took place during just those months when the price of the dollar in Great Britain showed the greatest relative increase.

Furthermore, although the price of the dollar in Great Britain rose 34 per cent from January, 1919, to December, 1919, the wholesale price of commodities in Great Britain rose 59 per cent in the same period. In other words, at no time during the year 1919 was the increase of the cost of the dollar in Great Britain as great as the increase of the wholesale price of British goods.

The American Exchange Bank sets out the fundamental economic situation of Europe as follows:

Until recently we have known little or nothing about the true condition of affairs in Europe. The explanation of our ignorance is simple. In the first place, we were led to hasty conclusions by the emotional reports of early observers inspired by the visual evidence of destruction and the sentimental appeals of the afflicted people. In the second place, sufficient time had not elapsed for a definite expression of the saving factors in the situation. The destruction was magnified a hundred times by observers who stood in a tea cup and visioned the rim as the horizon of all Europe. Anybody who stands on the battle fields of the Great War can not but be impressed with the destruction visible on every side, but the battle fields of the war comprise only a very limited area—millions and millions of acres and many towns never saw a soldier other than those they sent to the war. A good walker could cover the entire battle area of Belgium in half a day. The French field was more extensive, but relatively was hardly more important than that of Belgium. At first we believed that Belgium had been wiped off the map, and later we believed that practically all of northern France had suffered the same fate. We know now that the problem of the physical restoration of Europe is comparatively unimportant—that the destruction of tools and machinery wrought by the war has been greatly exaggerated.

What we do not appreciate fully as yet is the almost complete destruction of the economic morale of the people of some of the afflicted countries, particularly France, and the economic disorganization that resulted from the peace. Germany's morale has been affected even more than that of France, but strangely enough the impairment of economic morale in Germany is due to despair, while that in France is due to hope. In other words, Germany has ceased to function economically because the German mind has despaired at the task of building a new economic organization to replace that scrapped at Versailles, while the French until recently seemed content to sit on the front-door step and wait until the Germans served dinner, even refusing the Germans the use of the confiscated utensils which lay rusting in the back yard, which is to say that the French people expected the German indemnity to usher in the millennium and so ceased to exert themselves.

But the hope of the French poilu that he would be able to live in the future on the fruits of German industry was not the only imponderable that tended to destroy morale. The worker, the munition maker, and man behind the lines in France, in England, and even in this country let down the minute the armistice was signed and they have been "soldiering" ever since. Humanly considered, it is possible to feel a lot of sympathy for this attitude, especially in those who underwent severe physical and mental suffering on account of the war; but economically considered, it is impossible to escape the danger it implies, not only to those who assume the attitude but to the rest of the world as well. Economic considerations must govern—if the world would eat, it must work—and this applies to those who were victorious in the war as well as to those who were not, to those who bore a large part in it as well as to those who bore a small part.

If proof were needed that disinclination to work is the main deterrent to economic recovery in Europe, it could be found at its own door—in Belgium and in Czechoslovakia and to some extent in Italy. Belgium is "coming back" with tremendous strides, because the Belgians are willing to work and are working. Belgium has not only restored her former industries to a comparatively high state of production but she has developed new industries. For example, her exports of shoes in October, 1919, showed an increase of 300 per cent (in volume, not in currency) over those of the same month in 1913. Wrought wood products showed an increase almost as great, and there were numerous other increases in goods for which the raw materials were at hand. Her textile industry is almost fully restored, her iron and steel industry less so, but that is also being brought to normal. Belgium's explanation of her recovery is that her workers were not demoralized during the war by a fictitious prosperity in the form of increased money wages and are content with their present comparatively high pay.

While our people will continue to give of their substance we must of necessity guard against unwise policies.

The following dispatch from Paris, February 28, is suggestive:

PARIS, February 28.

The United States is spending nearly $8,000,000 a month in food relief work in central Europe and is making constant efforts for the relief of children there, officials of the children's relief fund, with offices in Paris, report. The work is being carried on with the combined aid of the American Relief Warehouses and the Children's Relief Fund of the American Relief Administration.

Food warehouses have been established in Warsaw, Vienna, Hamburg, Prague, Budapest, and Danzig. Persons in the United States desiring to aid families in central Europe may go to their home banks and purchase food drafts for $10, $25, or $50 and forward the drafts to the American Food Warehouse nearest the families they wish to help. A package containing flour, condensed milk, bacon, beans, and other fatty food will be sent to the family indicated by the sender of the draft.

The cost of the operation is reduced to a minimum through the service of local committees. Supervision in each district is placed in the hands of three or four American workers. All profits are devoted to the children's relief fund.

A conservative estimate places at more than 3,000,000 the number of children receiving food and who will receive clothing as soon as conditions permit.

Gratitude for this relief work has been expressed by President Seitz, of Austria; Premier Skulski, of Poland; Premier Huszar, of Hungary; and President T. G. Masaryk, of Czechoslovakia.

We must not heed the fantastic proposal of Sir George Paish to issue $35,000,000,000 international bonds and underwrite them. Nor can we hearken to Keynes in his proposals. We must also guard ourselves on the following proposal given out in London February 28:

POWERS TO BE URGED TO FORM EXCHANGE BANK—FINANCIERS WILL PROPOSE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTION UNDER LEAGUE OF NATIONS—CREDIT TO BE UNLIMITED—SUGGESTION WILL BE TAKEN UP AT FINANCIAL CONFERENCE NEXT MONTH.

LONDON, February 28.

It is now known that proposals will be made to the League of Nations financial conference, the meeting of which has been postponed until next month, for the formation of an international exchange bank backed up by the principal countries of the world. Walter Leaf, chairman of the London County and Westminster Bank, in his inaugural address as president of the Institute of Bankers, said:

"You are aware of the memorandum which was placed before the Government asking for an international conference on the whole question of exchange and the measures by which the present deadlock in the commerce of the world can best be overcome. You have seen that the chancellor of the exchequer has given the unqualified support of the Government to that conference.

"The conference now has been called by the League of Nations. When it meets I expect that a proposal will be put before it—a proposal emanating from distinguished bankers in neutral countries and one which will be well worth a good deal of thinking over beforehand in order that, if the time comes, our representatives in that conference may be able to come to it with the advantage of previous reflection, for it is a serious proposition.

"The main idea is that an international exchange bank should be established with unlimited capital, backed, that is, by the credit of all the Governments taking part. This bank would receive from each country a pledge of gold or approved securities, against which it could issue certificates—obligations or notes, if you like—on a gold basis, in which all international transactions would be carried out. This new currency would be essentially a money of account only. Its obligations would be ultimately convertible into gold and meanwhile would be simply a medium of barter, convertible in each country at the office of a central bank into the currency of that country.

"The immediate needs of the different countries' credits would be met by a fiduciary issue of obligations to the certain multiple of gold and securities which that country had deposited, proper regard being had to the evidence which that country could give of good will and ability to redeem this fiduciary issue within a reasonable time limit."

Mr. Speaker, in our vote on this bill let us make it known that we are not continuing the policy of European loans. That policy must be ended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not, I want to suggest that the gentleman's speech is rather hard-boiled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the starving people in Austria and Armenia, and the starving babies in Budapest, I want to thank the steering committee of the House for being willing to permit the House to consider this bill even under a suspension of the rules. [Applause.] I do not think there is a man here who is so lacking in humanity or who has the courage to vote against this bill. I am going to see that we have a record vote on it so that every man can vote according to his judgment and his conscience. But I can not understand why action has not been taken earlier. A month and a half ago the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously reported out a bill granting this same relief, only it was expressed in dollars—$50,000,000—while this bill, according to Mr. Barnes and according to other testimony, appropriates flour worth $53,000,000, or $3,000,000 more than the original bill.

Mr. FESS. This bill does not appropriate any money.

Mr. KITCHIN. This flour is worth $10.60 a barrel, so 5,000,000 barrels is $53,000,000, or $3,000,000 more than the bill which the Rules Committee refused to permit the House to consider.

Mr. FESS. What portion of this bill appropriates any money?

Mr. KITCHIN. Which bill?

Mr. FESS. This bill that we are now considering.

Mr. KITCHIN. It authorizes the Grain Corporation to sell or dispose of, for cash or credit, 5,000,000 barrels of flour worth $53,000,000. It simply appropriates the flour instead of the money; that is all. In the other bill we appropriated the money to buy the flour and then sell the flour.

Mr. FESS. The flour does not come out of the Treasury.

Mr. KITCHIN. You can not tweedledum or tweedledee out of this proposition to-day, because you know that the public sentiment of this country is absolutely unanimous to grant this relief; and the only relief that Austria and Armenia can get throughout the world is from America. [Applause.] Yet the steering committee and the Rules Committee refused even to permit this House to consider or vote upon a bill that did not give quite so much, reported unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means a month and a half ago.

Whatever number of deaths have occurred since January 31, when we unanimously reported this bill out of the Committee on Ways and Means, must be charged to the steering committee of this House. I understand from circulars sent to me and private letters I have received that over 30,000 people in Austria alone have absolutely perished from starvation since we reported out the bill. If the House and the Senate had passed that bill on January 31, when our committee unanimously reported it, then 30,000 people in Austria alone would have been saved, and, taking in Armenia and the children in Budapest, there must have been at least 50,000 people whose deaths must be charged to the steering committee of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. If the steering committee had permitted the House to vote on this measure a month and a half ago, when it was unanimously reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, there would have been nothing in the world for Mr. Barnes to do except to order by cable from wheat or flour in Europe the 5,000,000 barrels of flour to Vienna, Budapest, and Armenia, and he would have replaced it with the 5,000,000 barrels of flour he has on hand, and the horrible catastrophe of thousands of men, women, and children dying from hunger would have been prevented. Why did the steering committee oppose it a month and a half ago? Every man on the steering committee, every man on the Rules Committee, is in favor of this bill now—they dare not vote against it—is in favor of granting $50,000,000 or $53,000,000 worth of flour for the relief of the identical people for whom we reported the bill a month and a half ago. Why did you of the steering committee oppose it then?

The Republicans of this House did not oppose it. The Republicans of this House, four-fifths of them, favored the bill then. Every Republican on the Ways and Means Committee favored the bill then, but the power in the House—the steering committee—opposed it. Six members of the steering committee opposed it. The Rules Committee did not oppose it. There is not a man on the Rules Committee who would not have been glad to report the rule giving the House a chance to consider it, but the Rules Committee has no more say so than the man in the moon about what legislation shall pass here or what rules shall be reported out. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Dr. FESS, of the Rules Committee, favored it; Mr. SNELL, of the Rules Committee, favored it——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, chairman of the Rules Committee, favored it——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I am not going to let you gentlemen impeach your humanity by denying it. [Laughter and applause.] I am going to do more credit to the gentlemen than they dare to themselves. I know you did not oppose it. You favor it now and are going to vote for it, every one of you.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. The steering committee said to the Rules Committee, "Don't you report a rule on that bill; let them die. We Americans are not responsible for the deaths of the people in Austria; they are 4,000 miles away from us! We are not responsible for the death of the babies in Budapest; they are not our babies; they are not kin to us, and they are 4,000 miles away from us! We do not care how many of the fleeing, persecuted Armenians perish from hunger; they are not our people; they do not belong to our family; they are no kin to us; they are 4,000 miles away from us; let them die!" That was and has been the position of the steering committee, while at least four-fifths of the Republican Members and four-fifths of the Democrats in the House—more, I believe, every man in the House on both sides, except members of the steering committee, favored consideration and passage of the bill then. This steering committee hoped to defeat any relief measure by a manipulation of its power in the House, while not a single member of it would have had the courage to vote against it on this floor if the House had been given the opportunity to vote on it, or has the courage to-day to vote against it, when the vote is taken. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have a few minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has a few minutes remaining.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, there should be, and I hope there will be, no politics in this matter. I want to read one paragraph from a letter which I received from a nurse who is now over in Poland doing relief work. It is dated at Kovel, Poland, January 17, 1920:

But there is not enough food. America is sending supplies, but there are still millions of children and adults that are hungry. When in the most severe winter I see these children in rags and barefooted on the street it makes my heart ache. You may have difficulty in believing me; I know that if I were in America I would wonder how children could go around barefooted in the dismal cold and snow—but nevertheless it is a fact.

We found a house in Chelm where the father and mother had died of typhoid fever. There were four children left, 10, 7, 5, and 2 years old. When we came to the youngest, 2 years old, who was in the brick stove and only stuck its head out occasionally, it was without a stitch of clothes. Two of the children were lying in a bed on which there were no coverings; all they had was a little straw. The oldest child, clothed in a piece of rag, told us they didn't have anything to eat for two days, but before that once in a while some people had brought them something. They were waiting for God to help them.

No doubt the numerous communications and telegrams I have received have caused me to show an unusual interest in this legislation; no doubt the many reports of distress and suffering have touched my innermost sense of compassion and pity. Let me call attention to one typical letter. The author claims to speak from first-hand evidence—that of an eyewitness:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 12, 1920.

Hon. J. W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
Sixty-sixth Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have come back from a searching study of conditions in Poland, and as a citizen I ask you, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, to lay before the men of the Congress of our country facts which plead for the lives of millions of men, women, and children who look to America for the chance to live, with the hope and faith a dying man looks to God for mercy.

The people of Poland are not merely cold, they are freezing; they are not hungry, they are starving. The graveyards are crowded, and still the offensive of winter and want continues, the death rate is skyrocketing; child mortality is rapidly approaching the terrible figure of 50 per cent.

I saw a nation of homeless people, shivering in rags, waiting in long lines everywhere, begging on the streets for a crumb of bread, and their pinched, bloodless faces, their blue lips, their wasted, bent bodies, and feeble voices said, "We are dying."

It is biting cold, and only the very, very few, the rich, have coal or wood or any kind of fuel. Food, fats, oils, milk, sugar, bread, all of these are scarce; little, almost nothing, for the poor, and in Poland the poor are the nine hundred and ninety-nine in every thousand.

I have seen countless women, young and old, their shivering bodies scantily covered by a few thin rags, old newspapers used as linings, shoeless, stockingless, without underwear.

Hunger faints are epidemic; disease is rampant—disease which mercifully shortens the horror; disintegration is the right word to describe it, because death comes in Poland only in the name of disease.

The war literally crucified the child life of Poland. In the 60,000 square miles of war zone the Polish peasants were driven into Russia before the retreating Russian Army; the homeless, fatherless, motherless children were forced to remain in that horrible strip of hell during the Von Hindenburg drives. These children, abandoned to the horrors and tortures of war, lived in dugouts and trenches, in deserted barns, and even in the open. They ate the refuse left by the armies. When this was scarce they ate anything available, grass and roots, even dirt. A million of these children are being mobilized in the barracks built by the Russians and Prussians during the war. This is the greatest reclamation service in history. I saw many of these children, their hair matted, tousled, and dirty; their skin gray and grimy and so tightly drawn over their skulls that one would think a smile would cause it to break. Their little bodies wasted until one could put a pencil in the spaces between the ribs; their stomachs fallen and distended, starvation stomachs; the muscles undernourished and weakened. The childhood in these little victims of the war was almost dead; their eyes stared with hurt. An effort was made to awaken the youth in them; toys were brought from Paris. That you may understand the horror of this tragedy I write you that these children had forgotten how to play. When these million children go to bed in Poland to-night and, in their hunger and cold, pray to God for food and warmth, they are appealing to you.

Poland is bending, breaking, and falling, and this is the Poland that gave to the United States in her hour of supreme trial Kosciusko and Pulaski; Kosciusko, whom the Congress of the United States voted a citizen for his services to American freedom. We remembered Lafayette and paid our debt to France. Shall we forget Kosciusko? Can we stand deaf and unmoved to the help cries of millions of men, women, and children who are in this very hour waiting for help or death?

I have another communication here from a young lady who went to Poland as a Young Women's Christian Association worker. It is quite in harmony with other evidence presented to the committee:

I went to Poland as a representative of the Young Women's Christian Association in June, 1919, and remained there until January 22, 1920.

The association had trained Polish-American girls to do relief work in Poland. I went to see what sort of work they could best do in a country that was in need of all sorts of relief work. To do this I visited German Poland and Austrian Poland, or Galicia, and the devastated district as far east as Minsk, which was then in the hands of the Bolsheviki.

There are now 30 of these Polish-American girls doing relief work for children in all parts of Poland. They are working as volunteers. I wish you could see, as I have seen, the little, thin, pinched faces of those children, with crooked legs from rickets, with bad eyes, and all sorts of deformities, from lack of nourishment. The death rate is as high as 50 per cent in some districts.

Among the laboring families there are almost no children of 4 or 5 years of age. They all have died from lack of nourishment. I wish you could see the children who are in desperate need of hospital care with tuberculosis, typhus, smallpox, and have the hospitals refuse to take these children because they have no food. I wish you could see the thin faces of the children in the many orphanages which have been established, as day by day their amount of food is decreased because they are getting to the end of the food which has been given them by America.

One can never forget the cries of one of those patient mothers—for Poland has been taught patience for 140 years by the Germans, the Austrians, and the Russians—when a bread line is told there is no more bread, and she is fairly forced to shriek, "No work! No food! My children are starving!"

I wish you could have seen a weaver from Luch when she told me that her factory had closed down. You know, perhaps, that Luch is called the Manchester of Poland. It is a very imposing city, with its numerous smokestacks, which, alas, now are smokeless.

Last summer, through the kindness of America, the Poles secured six and a quarter million dollars' worth of cotton and were overjoyed to start part of the textile factories in Luch. They were striving desperately to be able to export something by spring to show the world that they wanted to become a self-supporting nation.

Poland will break unless they are given relief not later than the 1st of April. They will not become Bolsheviks. That small Polish Army, poorly equipped, poorly clothed, and poorly fed, is desperately fighting Bolshevism for the nation, but they will break because the nation can not face dire need forever.

A few weeks after we came to Poland an archbishop stopped us on the street because we were Americans and thanked us for the food from America. We never visited an institution but that they showed what they had received from America. They are depending upon America as their best friend.

You have started a splendid piece of work in Poland. This is just finishing it. Do lend them the $50,000,000 and complete a good job.

LOIS DOWNS.

Gentlemen, I do not feel as others do about Poland. Poland stands in the gap between the world and anarchy and Bolshevism in Russia. I am willing to aid them to keep back that great army of Bolshevists that would overrun the world if we would only permit it.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I want to remind the gentleman who is now occupying the floor that in more than 12 conversations and in a letter written to me over a month ago he stated that he was for this measure and would do everything in his power to bring about what we are trying to bring about here.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; I believe I would be more generous than the average man. I am sympathetic; I know that these conditions appeal to me. I never would feel happy to know that I could sit down with my wife and children with plenty to eat while my neighbors were starving. I could not live happily under such circumstances. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would ask the gentleman from North Carolina not to ask for the yeas and nays—let this be unanimous.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; I think the world ought to know how humanitarian this House is. We all ought to vote unanimously for this.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, America has been generous to Europe as no people have ever been generous in all the tide of time. We sent 2,000,000 of our boys across the seas, and many thousands of them gave up their lives in the contest. We spent $26,000,000,000 of our treasure to fight Europe's fight, for that contest, while it was the contest of civilization, was primarily Europe's contest. We have loaned Europe ten billions of our good money and so far not a penny has been returned, even of interest. Several billions of credits have been advanced by private individuals, on at least a portion of which the interest is not being regularly paid. There is not a household in the land that has not poured out its means for the relief first of Belgium and France and later Armenia, the Balkan States, Austria, and Poland and all the regions thereabout, and this private relief is still flowing millions a month. But there comes a time when Congress must question whether under the oath of its Members it can in time of peace continue to vote the money of the people in tens and hundreds of millions to relieve distress even under the terrible conditions existing in some parts of Europe. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] feels as he talks, he ought to introduce a bill, not for $50,000,000 worth of flour, but for at least half a billion of money, because this relief will not avert starvation in Russia; it will not appease the hunger and heal and bind the wounds of all the world; it will not begin to do that. If the gentleman from North Carolina thinks we ought to do that, that we are under obligations to do that, that as Members of Congress we are warranted in voting public money to do that, then this grant should be multiplied by 10 and the gentleman should propose it.

I call upon the gentleman, if he thinks we are responsible for all the suffering everywhere in the world and that we have warrant to appropriate the money of the American people to alleviate it, to bring in a bill and attempt to secure its passage providing not for this measure of relief but for ten times this measure of relief, for it will take ten times as much or more to fully relieve all the hunger and suffering, privation, and distress that has come upon the world in the wake of the Great War.

Mr. Speaker, we have been abundantly generous, and I was one of those who have thought, so far as cash contribution of the people's money by the Congress to Europe was concerned, that we had about reached a time when it was questionable whether the American people desired us to do so. It is very doubtful if we have constitutional authority to do so. But here is an opportunity to grant out of our abundance of foodstuffs, and we propose to do so to the extent of $50,000,000 worth of good, palatable flour. We are all for it, of course, and I am surprised in the granting of this aid the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] should have attempted to inject the question of politics, should have attempted in connection with this generous act to have suggested that we should have done more and done it long ago.

There is still much suffering in Europe, and will be after this aid is given. If the gentleman thinks we are bound to relieve it all, if we are under obligations, out of the Treasury of the United States, to feed everyone everywhere who may be hungry, to relieve all who are in distress and heal everyone everywhere who may be sick, I insist that the gentleman should back up his opinion and insist, after this bill is passed, that further relief shall be granted in sums sufficient to supply and relieve and heal all the world.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit just a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the judgment of the Chair——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina demands the yeas and nays. Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 285, nays 12, answered "present" 2, not voting 128, as follows:

EXAMINATION AND REPORT ON IMPERIAL VALLEY, ETC., IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 12537, with amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with amendments, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the bill now being read with the amendments incorporated in the reading or separately?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that the unanimous-consent request was to read the bill as amended and supposes that the bill will be read as amended, according to the motion offered. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12537) to provide for an examination and report on the condition and possible irrigation development of the Imperial Valley in California.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to have an examination made of the Imperial Valley in the State of California, with a view of determining the area, location, and general character of the public and privately owned unirrigated lands in said valley which can be irrigated at a reasonable cost, and the character, extent, and cost of an irrigation system, or of the modification, improvement, enlargement, and extension of the present system, adequate and dependable for the irrigation of the present irrigated area in the said valley, and of the public and privately owned lands in said valley and adjacent thereto not now under irrigation, which can be irrigated at a reasonable cost from known sources of water supply, by diversion of water from the Colorado River at Laguna Dam.

SEC. 2. That the said Secretary shall report to Congress not later than the 6th day of December, 1920, the result of his examination, together with his recommendation as to the feasibility, necessity, and advisability of the undertaking, or the participation by the United States in a plan of irrigation development with a view of placing under irrigation the remaining unirrigated public and privately owned lands in said valley and adjacent thereto, in connection with the modification, improvement, enlargement, and extension of the present irrigation systems of the said valley.

SEC. 3. That the said Secretary shall report in detail as to the character and estimated cost of the plan or plans on which he may report, and if the said plan or plans shall include storage, the location, character, and cost of said storage, and the effect on the irrigation development of other sections or localities of the storage recommended and the use of the stored water in the Imperial Valley and adjacent lands.

SEC. 4. That the said Secretary shall also report as to the extent, if any, to which, in his opinion, the United States should contribute to the cost of carrying out the plan or plans which he may propose; the approximate proportion of the total cost that should be borne by the various irrigation districts or associations or other public or private agencies now organized or which may be organized; and the manner in which their contribution should be made; also to what extent and in what manner the United States should control, operate, or supervise the carrying out of the plan proposed, and what assurances he has been able to secure as to the approval of, participation in, and contribution to the plan or plans proposed by the various contributing agencies.

SEC. 5. That, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to pay not to exceed one-half of the cost of the examination and report herein provided for, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $20,000: Provided, That no expenditure shall be made or obligation incurred hereunder by the Secretary of the Interior until provision shall have been made for the payment of at least one-half the cost of the examination and report herein provided for by associations and agencies interested in the irrigation of the lands of the Imperial Valley.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming demands a second. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Nebraska if the bill as read by the Clerk includes the amendments?

Mr. KINKAID. Includes the amendments of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming demands a second.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. KINKAID. And that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the requests of the gentleman from Nebraska. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wyoming is entitled to be recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield for a question?

Mr. KINKAID. I yield to the gentleman from Texas for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the great urgency for the immediate consideration of this bill?

Mr. KINKAID. I am just about to advise the House of the exigencies existing for the speedy enactment of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Has it anything to do with the soldier-bonus matter? Because if it will further that legislation along I am for it.

Mr. KINKAID. It may have later. This is a preliminary step looking to legislation for relief in general of the difficulties with which the Imperial Valley water users now contend in securing a water supply.

Mr. BLANTON. It may have something to do with the soldiers' bonus?

Mr. KINKAID. It is contemplated it will more or less.

Mr. BLANTON. The question I desire to ask——

Mr. KINKAID. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Nebraska admits that this bill may have something to do with the soldier-bonus matter, and I was under the impression that to expedite such legislation and to make it possible for a proper relief bill to be agreed upon and framed by one committee that all such bills were forced——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that that is not a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). To go to the Ways and Means Committee by a resolution of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Texas and sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, a very great exigency exists for the legislation in contemplation. This bill provides only for a preliminary step to be taken to secure information upon which to frame a bill for needed relief of water users and for the reclamation of public lands. The Committee on Irrigation has considered two bills already and has given extended hearings, which bills look to the permanent relief of the water users in the great Imperial Valley of California from the obstacles with which they contend in securing an adequate water supply, but deemed it prudent to take the preliminary step provided by the pending bill.

At the present time the water used is being conveyed from the Colorado River in the United States, in the State of California, south across the international boundary line into the Republic of Mexico, because when the project was first developed that was the less expensive mode, and the water is carried in an old river bed, the bed of the Alamo River, in the Republic of Mexico, for 40 miles in a direct line or 60 miles as the river meanders, in the Republic of Mexico, thence north again into California and into the Imperial Valley.

By carrying this water into Mexico the legal control of the water is lost and you will grant also the physical control of the water is lost to the American water users. Imperial Valley water users have thus been furnishing water to the people in old Mexico, the water users there, for nothing at all. At the same time they have been obliged to build levees in Mexico to protect themselves in the Imperial Valley in California from inundation in case a flood occurs, and they have had to carry expensive material across the line, timbers and metals and various kinds of equipments, and extortionate duties have been imposed upon such materials by the Mexican Republic. They have even been required to pay high duties for conveying their horses, mules, wagons, and dirt-handling machinery across the Mexican line when making levee repairs.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there not a company that controls this water in the Republic of Mexico, and has not this been a source of considerable correspondence between the United States and the Republic of Mexico over the water rights?

Mr. KINKAID. Not for many years. There has been no difficulty about that, I will say to the gentleman. This legislation does not contemplate raising any issue or difficulty whatever with Mexico concerning the water. Mr. Speaker, an acute condition is caused by the precarious situation of the intake, the hitch-up of the canal, whereby water is taken from the Colorado River in the United States, in California. The place at which they get the water is opposite the Yuma, Ariz., irrigation project, developed by the Government, and they are required during the season, when the water is low, in order to get the water raised high enough to take it out of the river into the canal, to place a temporary dam in the river, called a weir. Now, this dam is all the time a menace to the Yuma, Ariz., project, and it has imperiled the Arizona project to such an extent that injunction proceedings have been commenced by the Yuma water users, which is pending and has been in court for some time; but by the forbearance on the part of the Yuma project people the injunction suit has not been pressed to a final decision, upon the promises made continually by the Imperial Valley water users that before another season would come they would provide means that would enable them to dispense with the necessity of putting in this temporary dam. The Imperial irrigation district has had to take out the temporary dam each season when the exigency for its use has passed, because its existence would endanger the Yuma project and the water would rise, and if a flood would come with the dam remaining the Yuma project, which has cost millions of money for its development, would be cut to pieces by the flood, and the expensive Laguna Dam, built by the Government, might be destroyed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Is it not contemplated that the survey will develop the fact that it is possible to construct a ditch all in American territory?

Mr. KINKAID. That is it, sir. I was just getting to it. Now, it is contemplated that an all-American canal will relieve the situation, so far as carrying the water through the Republic of Mexico is concerned, and that the intake or place of diversion of the river will be changed from the place where it now is—where it endangers the Yuma, Ariz., project so greatly—will be changed to the Laguna Dam, which is 17 miles up the Colorado River, and the diversion will be made at the Yuma Dam and carried thence south to near the international boundary line, thence along the international boundary line on the California side until the proper place is reached to convey the water north into the valley. Thus the exigencies would be met.

Gentlemen, this is one of the greatest irrigation propositions in the world. There is the foundation there for the greatest amount of production of any irrigation proposition, far greater than any other in the United States, and probably the greatest irrigation proposition in the world. There can be the most gardening carried on and the largest amount of truck raised early in the season of any place in the United States.

The people there are not a people who want to depend on the Government for any financial aid. They will pay back to the Government every dollar which the Government may expend, if it shall expend any.

This bill provides for a preliminary step necessary to ascertain what the proper better solution will be, both for the present irrigators, those enterprising and energetic pioneers who have gone in there and developed 430,000 acres already and are now devoting it to the growing of crops. It will determine what will be the best for them and the best mode for developing the remaining Government land.

There is under private ownership about 500,000 acres, and there will be, say, 600,000 acres, mostly owned by the Government; about 300,000 acres have not yet been filed upon, so here is an opportunity for ex-service men to be provided for; and there is about 150,000 acres which have been entered but no patents issued. It is contemplated that the Government develop these undeveloped public lands; and it is desirable that the undertaking be joint for the reclamation of the Government lands and the better secured water supply for lands now in private ownership. The purpose is to find the best solution for a permanent and adequate water supply, well secured from any danger whatever, for the whole of the Imperial Valley, which would contain about 1,100,000 acres all told.

The present courageous and industrious home builders went into this valley and started the development there, and carried it up to a certain point, at a time when most people regarded it as impossible to accomplish anything worth while. They have carried it along until now they have met with this perilous condition which I have described to you, and they can not proceed further without legislation.

The question is what legislation is the most appropriate and will be the most satisfactory and the most conducive to the welfare of the settlers and of the public generally. They have been willing all the time to do their part. The Imperial Valley district has had one survey made of nearly all the area. It cost the Government $15,000 and the district paid $30,000 of the $45,000 expended. The Laguna Water Co. also made an extended survey at its own expense exclusively. This shows how ready they all are to help themselves. This bill provides that the water users shall furnish and expend at least one-half the money that it costs to make this survey. A very great exigency exists and there is a great necessity for the solution of the difficulties with which these people contend, who are deserving of exceptional credit for the wonders they have accomplished in developing the Imperial Valley and reclaiming it to successful farming as far as they have gone. It will be the greatest return in public good which can be conceived of, by the development of any irrigation proposition, when a substantial solution shall be made. We are now by this bill taking steps to ascertain what the legislation shall be.

Mr. STEVENSON. What are the principal products of the Imperial Valley?

Mr. KINKAID. They raise everything that you can raise in a latitude where you can grow crops all the year round. They irrigate all the year round.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have seen some of the finest cotton I ever saw raised there.

Mr. KINKAID. The highest-priced cotton that is raised in the world is raised there, and the yield is very large.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the present status of the bill?

Mr. KINKAID. This bill will take the preliminary steps.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is it on the calendar?

Mr. KINKAID. Oh, yes; unanimously reported, and up for consideration under supension of the rules. Mr. Speaker, I hope the bill will pass. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time for other members of our committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING], a member of the committee.

Mr. WELLING. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, not by reason of personal or local interest, but from the standpoint of national interest and welfare, I am convinced that the work provided for in the bill under consideration should be carried out effectively and expeditiously. My regret is that the bill is not more comprehensive and far-reaching. It is, however, a preliminary step in the right direction.

Nestling between ranges of mountains and below sea level, at the extreme south part of California, adjoining the Republic of Mexico, lies the Imperial Valley.

Less than two decades ago it was a barren desert of blistering, sweltering heat, and through which the most venturesome and hardiest hesitated to pass—a pitiless, useless waste—and to-day it is all that its name implies. It is the Imperial Valley, richer and more fertile than any like area in all the world. It has been a magic transformation from a barren desert to a valley of fruition and happy realization. Countless beautiful farms or ranches, as they are called there, with their homes surrounded by orange, grapefruit, lemon, apricot, pear, and date trees, beautify the landscape. The most beautiful flowers, under the 12 months of sunshine, grow in profusion and reckless abandon, and the atmosphere is redolent with their odors or perfume.

I know whereof I speak, as it was my good fortune, in April of 1919, to spend some time in the valley and to drive through it in its entirety. I was then impressed with the responsibility, the duty, yes, the obligation, resting upon the Federal Government, to take necessary action, promptly and comprehensively, to the end that the future of the valley may be assured and safeguarded for all time to come.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID], the chairman of the committee having in charge the bill, has outlined the general condition relating to the water supply of the valley and the vast interest of the Federal Government in the lands yet unpatented, and which can be made into acreage of immense value, and that, too, without the uncertainty of experimentation. The experimental period in the Imperial Valley has long since passed. The hardy, courageous, and brave men and women who pioneered there in the "winning of the desert" solved the problem, and their knowledge, hard won as it was, belongs to them and to those who followed after them.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] asked the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] what are the principal products of the valley; and answer could be very briefly and correctly made by the simple statement, almost all of the products known to the farm in any latitude. The farmers there produce and mow from 6 to 8 and 10 crops of alfalfa. The growing season covers all the year with the exception of five or six weeks, and the average production of hay is from 6 to 12 tons. The dwarf Milo maize, which is used in the place of corn, yields an average of 1 ton of the grain to the acre, while there are frequent yields of 1½ to 2 tons; and I learned that the standing stalks are used for ensilage. Of wheat the yield runs from 35 to 45 bushels to the acre. The hard varieties of wheat are usually produced. The valley has become celebrated for the quality of its cotton, both short staple and long staple being produced. Barley is one of the large products of the valley, and the yield under average conditions is between 50 and 55 bushels to the acre.

As I stated, I had the good fortune to go through the valley from one end to the other, and while there, knowing that the question might become a very important one for the consideration of the Congress, I investigated the difficulties which confronted the people of the valley relative to the supply of water which they obtain from the Colorado River. The water supply at present is carried from the Colorado River in the old bed of the Alamo River, through the Republic of Mexico, and delivered to the distribution works near Calexico, at the southern end of the Imperial Valley, and thence throughout the valley through the systems of 13 mutual water companies, of which the landowners are the stockholders.

During July and August the people of the valley are troubled with a relative shortage of water, the volume then obtainable being less than is secured during the other months of the year. The Mexican inhabitants, who have access to the water before it reaches the distribution works, which I have mentioned, waste the water with the greatest indifference and absence of conservation; in fact, they exercise no care whatever, and as I say, when the water is needed most in the valley, the supply is shortened by reason of the waste by the inhabitants of Mexico, as the latter secure the water at nominal rates, while the farmers and producers, who are located in the valley, are, of course, compelled to pay the regular rates or charges therefor.

An additional difficulty beyond that resulting from the waste of the water by the inhabitants of Mexico, and the lack of physical and legal control thereof by this Government, exists, and grows out of the fact that when the water in the Colorado River is low it becomes necessary to construct a weir dam, for temporary use, and which constitutes a serious menace to irrigation projects in the Yuma Valley, Ariz.; in fact, so serious that some time ago injunction proceedings were instituted by Yuma water users, and this suit is now pending, and if determined favorably to the Arizona projects, and the injunction enforced, would constitute a serious and destructive disaster to the Imperial Valley. To the credit of the Yuma water users, they have exercised a most generous forbearance, and have postponed pressing the litigation to a final conclusion. The situation which I mention carries a double threat. By reason of the construction of the temporary or weir dam each season, at the expense of the irrigation company supplying water to the Imperial Valley, and which construction is necessary, in order that during periods of low water the elevation thereof may be raised high enough to carry the water into irrigation channels for the Imperial Valley, an extraordinary expense results, particularly in view of the fact that the temporary dam must also each season be removed. The other threatening feature of the condition is that in the event of a flood in the Colorado River, before the removal of the temporary dam, disastrous overflow would occur to the infinite damage of the Yuma Valley irrigation territory.

By the construction of the all-American canal, at a cost of from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000, the water from the Colorado River would be carried entirely through American territory, the threatening condition both to the Yuma Valley and the Imperial Valley entirely removed, and the supply of water for both the Yuma Valley and the Imperial Valley would be safeguarded for all time, as the control thereof, both physical and legal, would be vested and retained entirely in the hands of our Government.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is it not a fact that under the present system the Mexican people get their water going through the canal and pay nothing to maintain the irrigation system?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. That is true; and during the months of July and August the people of the valley need water badly for the various crops, and can not secure it in the volume desired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I want to call attention to the fact that there is nothing in this bill which commits the Government to the expenditure of any $30,000,000. This is simply to authorize a survey to ascertain how much it will cost, and as to what proportion the Government should contribute.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Yes; the gentleman is correct. I am simply addressing myself to the proposition that the survey is important and necessary to the development of this vast expanse of territory, because in order to determine whether the survey and examination should be made, as provided in the bill, there should be considered the benefits which will accrue, not only to the valley but to the country, by adding thereto a territory which will probably contribute to our present production in value annually a hundred millions of dollars, and thus contribute to our national wealth during all of the years to follow.

Around the valley there extends mesa land, a higher elevation than the valley proper, and which can not now be reached by the present irrigation project, but which will be brought under irrigation when the water is carried through American territory by an all-American canal; and there are certain portions of the valley, also, which will be reached by the irrigation system. The improvement, when completed, would open up, as the chairman of the committee has said, between 500,000 and 600,000 acres of additional land, just as rich and productive, when irrigated, as the land of the lower parts of the valley.

Mr. LITTLE. And Government land?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Probably three hundred or three hundred and fifty thousand acres of Government land, which has not been filed upon. The value of that land would range from $150 to $200 per acre and would largely exceed the entire cost of an all-American canal. Irrigated and improved land in the Imperial Valley sells for from $200 to $300 per acre, and it will readily be seen how much the Government will profit by such an improvement, even if it bore the entire cost thereof; but this is not intended, as the people of the valley and the owners of the land will assume and discharge their full share or proportion of the cost of the improvement.

I have only spoken of the production in the valley from the land itself, but there are vast numbers of hogs, herds of cattle, and flocks of sheep. The total production of the valley even now under irrigation exceeded in value $50,000,000 in 1918. The population in 1910 was, in round numbers, 13,000, and in 1919 exceeded 60,000. The value of the productions in 1910 were $5,000,000, and in 1919, as I have stated, exceeded $50,000,000. These results tell their own story and magnify the dreams of those who 18 years ago conceived this wonderful improvement and the reclamation of an arid waste which to-day embraces wonderful farms, beautiful modern cities, and a happy, aggressive, progressive, energetic, prosperous people who enjoy a production of farm products not only unsurpassed but unequaled anywhere.

Mr. LITTLE. There is also wonderful fruit raised there.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Yes; of every tropical variety, and in the greatest abundance, and yet the production in that respect is still in its infancy. Killing frosts are unknown, and every condition is favorable to the production of all fruits of tropical variety and vegetables of every character.

Let it be remembered, too, that the production of the valley, whether cereal, fruit, or vegetable, is available for the earliest market everywhere and therefore easily finds ready sale and meets an imperative demand.

In addition to the reasons I have given there is another very important one. Many plans have been suggested having in view the recognition by the Government of the magnificent and patriotic services of those gallant Americans who returned to civil life after the victorious conclusion of the World War. The hundreds of thousands of acres of Government land which will be reclaimed in the Imperial Valley by the construction of the canal can be used for the purpose of soldier settlement, and the soldiers of the war can be given preferential status and become the beneficiaries when the land will have been reclaimed and opened for filing. No more economical plan has been proposed, and none which will prove so beneficial and profitable, not only to the soldiers but to the country, and if there were no other reasons for the speedy completion of this great improvement, and there are other important reasons, this alone would be sufficient to warrant the Government in prosecuting to completion the construction of the canal.

I feel sure that the bill will pass, and will welcome the day when this much-needed, most profitable, and most deserved improvement, the building of an all-American canal through all-American territory for an American people, will have been completed and thus reward the years of effort exerted in season and out of season by the Hon. WILLIAM KETTNER, the able and distinguished Representative from the eleventh California district, in which is located the Imperial Valley. [Applause.]

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the committee, I am strong for this legislation. Imperial Valley is considered to be the richest spot on earth. From the land cultivated and the amount of crops obtained therefrom there is no place in the world that excels its production. There are in the neighborhood of 1,000,000 acres, much of it, about 500,000 acres, in private ownership, and possibly two-fifths of the privately owned land has not been sufficiently irrigated. Then there is in the neighborhood of 500,000 acres of public land. There is in addition to this about 400,000 or 500,000 acres that has not been designated that will be brought in under cultivation that is now in the Salton Dead Sea that before the Colorado River broke over was desert land and not irrigated. The project will involve the proper handling of the questions of evaporations as regards the Salton Sea. This land was submerged by the breaking over of the Colorado River.

In addition to the crops mentioned, you should not overlook the canteloupe, the dates, the oranges, the lemons, the barley, wheat, and so forth—go down there at this time of year and you will see them heading their wheat and barley. Crops of alfalfa for this year have already been cut. It is the same way with tomatoes; in fact, everything that the human family needs, almost, grows in this valley 12 months out of the year. Not only, as the gentleman stated, do they have seven crops, but they cut as high as 12 crops of alfalfa per year, and everything in proportion. To do this it must require water. Except the land surrounding the edge it is the deepest soil that has been discovered in any place. It has been filling in there for thousands of years. We have no rain there, except once in two or three years it sprinkles a little overnight or for a day. This proposition will involve very little expense to the Government, not over $25,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that they raise crops of alfalfa every 30 days?

Mr. RAKER. They can raise it in 18 days; but the ordinary crop they raise now is a crop that can be produced in 30 days at 2 tons or more per acre.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. How much would this make available?

Mr. RAKER. About 300,000 acres of public land.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Does the gentleman say that would bring the enormous price he mentioned?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and it would, in addition, provide water sufficient for irrigation of the land in private ownership that is not sufficiently supplied with water now. This is a meritorious project, and should have the Government's assistance. Every dollar expended will come back, and the Government will not lose but will be the gainer in the end. There is another thing that I want to call to the attention of the committee.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to ask the gentleman if this measure makes provision to take care of the evaporation?

Mr. RAKER. It will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to express the hope that this bill will become a law. The purpose is ultimately to have this all-American canal. Where the waters of the Colorado River are taken out to irrigate the Imperial Valley is below the international boundary, and about 12 or 14 years ago, during a period of flood, the Colorado River broke through and destroyed the control works and threatened to overflow the valley. There is no drainage there. There is no way to get the water out of the valley after it once gets in except by evaporation. It creates the Salton Sea, as it is called. We undertook to check the flood when the Colorado River broke through, but the Mexican Government would not permit us to do it. It would not permit any American concern to do it, so it became necessary to give the contract to a Mexican firm, mere dummies, to give them a rake-off—if gentlemen understand what that means—in order to let an American corporation go in and actually do the work. The Mexican Government charged a tariff on the mules taken in, on the hay, on everything. The railroad company was requested by President Roosevelt to do the work because great destruction was threatened to this valley as well as to the railroad. A very distinguished engineer from this country, Maj. Ockerson, was sent down there to superintend the work; and I might mention in passing that this Government did not keep the faith the President plighted, for it never did pay back the million dollars it cost the railroad. Unless this work is done and this all-American canal is constructed we will be dependent upon the whims of Mexico to permit us to go into Mexico and get the water to irrigate the valley, and another occasion similar to the one I have just mentioned may occur any time. This is a sore spot on an already irritated if not inflamed border, and the sooner this all-American canal is finished the better it will be for the peace of the land. There can be no question that there is a Federal interest involved, and this bill ought to pass.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I think gentlemen ought to understand what this Government has done. This Government ran an injunction on them that prevents them from keeping up their dam. They got along all right, but there is a standing injunction that makes it impossible for them to maintain a dam. The Government did that for them. When they wanted to sell bonds to build a bigger dam, this Government, through the loan board, put out a statement that their credit was not good, so that they could not sell their bonds. I just wanted you to realize how kind the Government had been to them. The Mexicans now help the thing along a little. The water has to go around through Mexico, and the Mexicans take as much as they want to and do not help any on the project. This is the most remarkable success ever achieved in the world, and it has been done by people who went down there and built it up, with everybody on earth and everything in nature fighting them. They want you now to go down and look it over, and see whether you will not help them to redeem 300,000 acres of yours and put them on the market.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands has had exhaustive hearings with reference to the solution of the problem of irrigation in the Imperial Valley. It is conceded by everybody who understands the problem that the eventual solution of that question will cost in the neighborhood of from forty to fifty million dollars. Bills have been introduced by my friend Mr. KETTNER, representing this great valley here in Congress, looking to that solution. It was proposed not that the Government should advance this money but that it should secure the bonds of the people of the Imperial Valley who propose to build the water system. The committee felt, and I trust that that will be the judgment of the House, that it was not a proper time for the Government to loan its credit to these excellent people for the purpose of building this project, especially in view of the fact that surveys that have thus far been made for the all-American canal are not considered complete or adequate.

This bill provides simply for the continuing of those surveys, half the cost to be paid by the Government of the United States and one-half by the people of the Imperial Valley, and when they are completed that the Secretary of the Interior shall recommend to Congress what ought to be done in cooperation with the people of Imperial Valley to complete the project.

The growth of irrigation in Imperial Valley is one of the remarkable romances of the conquest of the desert. It has grown from worthless desert to the most productive spot on earth within the memory of men still in their prime and still active in solving this most interesting problem. The water used is diverted from the lower Colorado River by means of a temporary dam, which must be removed each year to protect the entire project and also the Yuma project in Arizona during high water.

This annual expense amounts to more than $150,000, and besides is maintaining a constant menace which is intolerable and must eventually be corrected.

The solution to the problem involves a new outlet connecting the canals of Imperial Valley with the Government-owned Laguna Dam, now furnishing water to the Yuma project in Arizona.

Intimately associated with this proposed diversion at Laguna Dam is the construction of the all-American Canal upon the California side of the international boundary line.

The building of the canal will provide water for the irrigation of an additional 500,000 acres of public and desert land now owned chiefly by the United States. These lands are as good or better than lands now in the Imperial irrigation district.

I want the House to realize that this great project can not be fully constructed without providing for storage upon the upper watersheds of the Colorado River in Utah and Colorado.

This bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and report upon such storage projects. It is a comprehensive program which will eventually redeem more than a million acres of land, not only in California but also in Utah and Colorado, where the flood waters of the Colorado River originate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is simply to appropriate a sum not to exceed $20,000 for an investigation. The people of the Imperial Valley are to pay one-half of the cost of this investigation, and if the total cost comes to more than $40,000, they are to pay any amount required for the same in addition to this $20,000. It has been stated here that the Imperial Valley is perhaps the most fertile irrigated section in the world. Twenty years ago the Imperial Valley was a desert. It was pointed out to tourists on the transcontinental trains as the great Colorado desert, where nothing would live except rattlesnakes, horned toads, centipedes, and scorpions. A few pioneers went in there and at their own expense and by their own efforts brought water into that section and made of it one of the most fertile areas in the United States, if not in the entire world. The present irrigation system has been described. The water is taken from the Colorado River on the American side, carried through Mexico and back into the Imperial Valley in California. The necessity of bringing the water through Mexico has placed the people of the Imperial Valley at the mercy of the Mexicans. Mexico gets one-half of the water as it goes through that country and pays absolutely nothing for it. The Mexicans pay nothing toward maintaining the irrigation system. The entire expense is borne by the people of Imperial Valley. The Mexican Government is now planning to place under irriagtion large tracts of land south of the national boundary, and this will take more water from the Colorado River and from this irrigation system. The result is that the people of the Imperial Valley must have relief, and they have planned to get relief by building an all-American canal—a canal entirely on American territory—so that they will no longer be at the mercy of the Mexican Government and the Mexican people. The purpose of this resolution is simply to appropriate money to make the necessary investigation and to enter into the necessary business arrangements with the irrigation districts already existing there, and to determine what part of the expense shall be paid by the Federal Government to bring its lands under irrigation, and what part shall be paid by the people of the Imperial Valley. The question has been asked here if this contemplates soldier legislation. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas and to the Members of the House that this resolution does contemplate legislation for the benefit of the soldiers of the late war. This resolution and the proposed legislation for the improvement of the Imperial Valley irrigation system and the reclaiming of the public lands of that section have been approved by the American Legion and other organizations of returned service men in many parts of the United States. They are strongly in favor of the proposed plan.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible in five minutes to tell the wonderful and romantic story of the Imperial Valley. A few years ago some hardy pioneers went into that wonderful valley with its forbidding arid areas below sea level and with a vision worthy of a seer they diverted the waters of the Colorado River, and by their untiring efforts in the face of countless difficulties developed about 400,000 acres of perhaps the most productive land on the face of the earth. They are in the midst of very great perplexities. It will be impossible permanently to maintain their present diversion dam. There is only one possible point of permanent diversion and that is controlled by the Government at the Laguna Dam. This fact and the further fact that there is an international question to be solved makes it necessary for the Federal Government to interest itself in the final solution of the irrigation reclamation of this region. There are about 200,000 acres of public-owned land in the valley which can be irrigated.

It is proposed by the legislation before us to have an investigation to determine how large an area can be irrigated and the way in which it can be best irrigated, and who should bear the cost of the work, how much of it, if any, the Federal Government should pay. In that connection there will be a question as to what shall be done with the 200,000 acres of public land. If the Government participates in the undertaking, which it may or may not do, in a way the matter involves a question of opportunities for our soldiers of the Great War. If the Government concludes to participate in the work, there will be opportunity to give the ex-service men a preference on the farms carved from the public lands.

The work is one that should be speedily undertaken, at least the examination should be speedily undertaken, and it is hoped that after the examination that is proposed it will be possible to carry out the complete development of that area and secure its complete reclamation without any very great burden or obligation being placed upon the Federal Government. The region is rich enough to secure the major portion at least of the funds that may be needed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Speaker two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

CASH ADVANCES TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES (S. DOC. NO. 255).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to resolution of the 4th ultimo, certain information concerning cash advances made by the Secretary of the Treasury to foreign Governments under the acts of April 24, 1917, September 24, 1917, April 8, 1918, and July 9, 1918.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the communication and accompanying papers be printed, also printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 13, 1920.

SIR: Pursuant to Senate resolution 291, requesting information concerning cash advances made by the Secretary of the Treasury to foreign Governments under the acts of April 24, 1917, September 24, 1917, April 8, 1918, and July 9, 1918, I have the honor to submit the following:

To and including November, 1918, the dates for the collection of interest from foreign Governments were May 15 and November 15. In the spring of 1919 the respective Governments were informed that it would be convenient for the Treasury to receive interest on April 15 and October 15 on approximately two-thirds of their respective obligations and on May 15 and November 15 on the remaining approximately one-third.

The following is an itemized statement showing the amount of interest heretofore paid by each of the foreign Governments on advances made to it by the United States Treasury:

Belgium	$10,907,281.55
Cuba	645,890.42
Czechoslovakia Republic	304,178.09
France	126,910,635.58
Great Britain	232,312,740.77
Italy	57,598,852.62
Liberia	161.10
Roumania	263,313.74
Russia	3,495,686.72
Serbia	636,059.14
Total	433,074,799.73

NOTE.—The amounts so paid represent, except in the case of Russia, the full amount of interest due up to April 15, 1919, or May 15, 1919, as the case may be. The amount paid on Russian obligations represents the interest up to November 15, 1917, in full, together with a partial payment of $1,865,925.08 on account of the interest which became due May 15, 1918, and a partial payment of $300,000 on account of the interest which became due November 15, 1918. The amount paid by the Government of Cuba includes $251,369.87, being the full amount of the interest accrued for the period from April 15, 1919, and May 15, 1919, up to October 15, 1919, and November 15, 1919, the last interest days. The amount paid by the French Government includes interest amounting to $1,810,441.50 paid to July 31, 1919, on an obligation dated January 28, 1919. The amount paid by the British Government includes $1,200,333.86 interest accrued after May 15, 1919, on $64,164,007.99 principal subsequently repaid by the British Government in connection with the adjustment of accounts. The amount paid by Roumania includes a partial payment of $154,409.63 on account of interest accrued to October 15, 1919.

The interest accrued to October 15, 1919, and November 15, 1919, as the case may be (the last interest dates), and remaining unpaid on advances made to foreign Governments by the Treasury, is as follows:

France	65,858,101.62
Great Britain	105,503,126.38
Italy	39,228,303.92
Liberia	331.24
Roumania	385,316.39

NOTE.—The Secretary of the Treasury holds a special fund of $1,808,506, which is equal to the unpaid balance of the interest which became due on Russian obligations on May 15, 1918. It is believed that ultimately this can be applied in discharge of said balance. A similar fund of $335,095.07 is held, which it is believed will be applicable upon the unpaid balance of the interest which became due November 15, 1918, on Russian obligations.

If no change is made in the interest dates above mentioned or in the distribution as now contemplated of obligations as between the April and May interest dates, the total interest which will have accrued on interest dates falling within the fiscal year 1920, on advances made to foreign Governments by the Treasury up to March 10, 1920, will be as follows:

Czechoslovakia	2,515,004.72
France	139,904,272.14
Great Britain	211,828,890.64
Greece	144,808.74
Italy	79,595,569.73
Liberia	969.76
Roumania	1,163,359.90
Russia	9,399,365.55

Of said sum of $463,215,613.06, there has been paid during the fiscal year 1920 the sum of $3,416,554.86 as above stated.

The obligations are in the form of certificates of indebtedness to the United States, and are expressed to be payable as to principal and interest without deduction for taxes of the debtor Government in gold coin of the United States of the present standard of weight and fineness at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York or at the Treasury of the United States in Washington. Certain of the obligations, at the option of the holder, are payable in the money of the debtor country, some at a fixed rate expressed in the obligation, and others at the buying rate for cable transfers of the currency of the debtor country in the New York market at noon on the day of demand, as determined by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

The certificates of indebtedness are signed in the names of the respective debtor Governments by representatives of such Governments designated to the Treasury by the Department of State as being authorized to sign the same in the name and on behalf of the respective Governments. The earlier certificates were payable at fixed dates of maturity, all of which are now passed, so that such certificates are now held as demand obligations. The earlier certificates bore interest at various rates of interest from 3 per cent per annum upwards. The certificates of indebtedness subsequently taken were expressed to be payable on demand, and bore interest at the rate of 5 per cent. By arrangement with the respective Governments, substantially all the obligations have since May 15, 1918, borne interest at the rate of 5 per cent. The certificates contain a provision that they are receivable in payment for bonds of the debtor Government or else a provision for conversion into such bonds in conformity with the provisions of the various Liberty bond acts in effect at the respective dates of the certificates of indebtedness. The second Liberty bond act as amended and supplemented provides that the rate or rates of interest borne by the long-time obligations for which the short-time obligations may be exchanged by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be not less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into such long-time obligations. In view of the fact that the short-time obligations all now bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent, the long-time obligations for which they may be exchanged must, unless the rate of the short-time obligations is changed, also bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

Inclosed is a skeleton copy of an obligation received under the fourth Liberty bond act. All the obligations are of the same general character, although there are among them differences, as above set out. The present uniformity of the interest rate and the provision of the Liberty bond acts relative to the interest to be borne by long-time obligations taken in exchange for short-time obligations render such differences immaterial.

Respectfully,

D. F. HOUSTON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. As in legislative session I present resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts favoring an early increase of the Federal grant for the soldiers' home in Massachusetts and in other States. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1920.

Resolutions favoring an early increase of the Federal grant for the soldiers' home in Massachusetts and in other States.

Whereas the present expense of maintenance of the soldiers' home in Massachusetts is largely borne by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, with some assistance by the Federal Government; and

Whereas under present circumstances the whole expense of repairs, improvements, and new construction falls on the Commonwealth; and

Whereas with constantly increasing costs the Federal grant of $100 a year for each inmate is becoming more and more inadequate, the maintenance expense amounting to more than $400 a year for each inmate; and

Whereas it does not seem proper that the Commonwealth should carry the whole burden of this rapid increase in expenditures: Therefore be it

Resolved, That, in the opinfon of the general court, that the Federal grant for the soldiers' home in this State and for similar homes in other States should be increased to a rate more nearly in proportion to the amount expended by the Federal Government to maintain an inmate in the soldiers' homes managed by Federal authority; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In the house of representatives, adopted February 20, 1920.
In senate adopted, in concurrence, February 26, 1920.
A true copy. Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGTRY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE. I also present resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution giving Congress power to regulate the hours of labor. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1920.

Resolutions in favor of an amendment of the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to regulate the hours of labor.

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby records its belief that the public interest will be better served and the hardships of human life ameliorated by the national regulation of the hours of labor by Congress, and respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States to propose an amendment to the Constitution giving it the power to regulate the hours of labor and to make the same uniform throughout the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

In house of representatives, adopted, February 20, 1920.
In senate, adopted, in concurrence, February 26, 1920.

ZINC ORE.

Mr. GORE. As in legislative session I give notice of an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 6238) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of zinc ore and manufactures thereof in the United States. I will state that this is substantially Senate bill 3334, introduced by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I move that the proposed amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. KEYES submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT ON BOLSHEVISM.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A committee of the Union League Club of New York City, charged with the duty of making a study of Bolshevism, has made a very interesting report, a copy of which I hold in my hand. I present it and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, with the suggestion that they give consideration to it, with a view to having it printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REV. EUGENE BELL (S. DOC. NO. 254).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

Referring to a report made by the Secretary of State on August 28, 1919, which was transmitted to the Senate on August 29, 1919, in response to a resolution adopted on July 18, 1919, requesting copies, if not incompatible with the public interest, of the records in the case, and all papers in the possession of the Department of State connected with the case of the Rev. Eugene Bell, an American citizen, at that time residing in Korea, charged with involuntary homicide, I transmit a copy of a comment on the report by the Government General of Korea, which was brought informally to the attention of the Department of State, with the explanation that it should not be regarded as an official memorandum but as an observation which the Government General of Korea desired to make and which the Japanese Government consented to convey. It is observed therein that the South Manchuria Railway, which is charged with the operation of the Korea Railway, is not a Government institution, but an independent corporation, and that any claim against that company for damages can be of no concern to the Government General of Korea, still less to the judicial branch of government.

WOODROW WILSON.

Inclosure: As above.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 16, 1920.

LABORERS IN CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. SMOOT. As in legislative session I report back favorably from the Committee on Finance, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 11309) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to fix compensation of certain laborers in the Customs Service. On account of the existing serious situation affecting the temporary employees in the Customs Service, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I shall make no objection provided it leads to no debate.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, after the word "hour," at the end of line 8, to insert a comma and "and credit for amounts paid since July 1, 1919, in excess of the rate of $2.50 per day shall be allowed in the accounts of customs officers," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to fix the compensation of temporary laborers in the Customs Service as he may think advisable, at a rate not exceeding the local rates prevailing in the various ports and districts for the same classes of labor: Provided, That it shall not exceed in any event 80 cents per hour, and credit for amounts paid since July 1, 1919, in excess of the rate of $2.50 per day shall be allowed in the accounts of customs officers.

SEC. 2. That this act shall expire December 31, 1920.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are herewith suspended while this act remains in force.

Mr. KING. I wish to ask for some explanation about that. It is retroactive, I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. If I may be allowed just one word of explanation, I will state that under the law the amount paid to these laborers can not exceed $2.50 per day and not more than $70 per month. Before a decision of the comptroller which limited the pay of temporary employees to 31¼ cents per hour, laborers were being employed at the various ports at the current rate of wages, provided a sum in excess of $70 was not paid to any one laborer within one month. The comptroller has so construed the law that the laborers can only be paid 31¼ cents per hour, but in no case more than $70 per month, or that $2.50 per day means 31¼ cents per hour. That construction has placed matters in such shape that it is absolutely impossible to get temporary employees in the customs service. Up to the time the comptroller rendered this decision they had been paying temporary laborers the current rate of wage, but in no case more than $70 per month. Under this holding of the comptroller customs officers who have employed labor at a higher rate than 31¼ cents per hour may be liable, under their bonds, for the amounts so paid out. The committee thought it altogether unjust to levy this liability upon such officers, who were acting in entire good faith.

Mr. KING. Does this increase the appropriation which has heretofore been made?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. The money has already been paid out by customs officers, but under the ruling of the comptroller they are held responsible for the amount of money paid over 31¼ cents an hour.

Mr. KING. Is there any limitation upon the number of employees who are placed in these various customs offices?

Mr. SMOOT. They are limited in the legislation already passed, where provision is made for their payment, I will say to the Senator, and this bill even provides a limitation on the provisions of this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. The question is on agreeing to the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate, but I desire a yea and nay vote on the reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed reservation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If it will not inconvenience the Senator from Massachusetts, I hope we may pass over the reservation for the present. The Senator from Oklahoma is not here, and I am sure he desires to be present when the proposed reservation is considered.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see how we can very well pass over the reservation. It is the pending reservation, and as yet there is nothing behind it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there will be plenty behind it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to make a few observations, and, perhaps, by the time I conclude the Senator from Oklahoma will have come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed reservation.

The reservation proposed by Mr. OWEN to the resolution of ratification of the German peace treaty was read, as follows:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course, if it were not for the fact that the pending treaty undertakes to cover the protectorate of Great Britain over Egypt, it would not be a matter about which the Senate would occupy itself; but it is in the treaty. It was placed there not merely for the purpose of securing the acknowledgment of Germany to the protectorate declared by Great Britain, but of securing the acknowledgment of all the nations, so that the protectorate would be recognized by all the different powers which should sign the treaty. It therefore, Mr. President, becomes a legitimate subject for consideration under the treaty, and in considering it we can not be charged with seeking to interfere in the affairs of Great Britain or with unduly interfering between Great Britain and her colonies.

Mr. President, I am not going over the history of England in Egypt. It has been completely covered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I only take a moment to say that it seems to me the United States ought to take the position indicated in this reservation. In the first place, I am inclined to believe that it is the position which most of the people of England take in regard to it. A great many expressions from what might be called the liberal press of England indicate the view which is expressed by this reservation.

I desire to call attention briefly to an article in the Nation, a London publication, of the issue of November 29, under the title "The problem of Egypt":

The Times has made us familiar with the phrase "The Egyptian Peril." In the crude sense of the word there is not and can not be a "peril" to the British Empire in Egypt. The Egyptians are not a fighting race; their flat country does not lend itself to guerrilla warfare; any violent movement in these days of machine guns, poison gas, and aeroplanes would end only in the massacre of the natives who attempted it. The "peril" is rather of the kind that confronts us in Ireland. A whole people stands solidly opposed to us. The very ministers who took office and salaries from our hands are so worked upon by public opinion that they range themselves against us. The masses of the towns and even the stolid fellahin of the villages are to-day, as they never were before, ranged behind the students and the intellectuals who always were against us. The rioting is recurrent, and when the crowds of men have been broken up processions of women confront us with a new problem. In Lord Cromer's day nationalism was a middle-class agitation. To-day organized trade-unions use the weapon of the strike against us. The "peril" means simply that by no resource of policy or coercion do we seem able to restore the normal pacific life of a well-governed British dependency. We fail in our self-imposed task, and a failure in the metropolis of Arabic and Islamic culture, at a moment when we are busy in spreading our rule or our influence over Palestine, Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Persia, is certainly a "peril," for it involves a serious blow to our prestige. If we mean to go on we have to prove over again that we can govern.

The origins of this revival of a militant nationalism so much more determined and unanimous than any of its predecessors are not mysterious when one reviews the facts. The proclamation of a protectorate in December, 1914, was a staggering blow to the hopes of the nationalists. So long as our status in Egypt was legally undefined and unrecognized they clung to the dream that the occupation might one day end. They have their register of our promises to withdraw. There are, they say, no less than 60 official repetitions of that pledge, which, in Mr. Gladstone's famous words, "If one pledge can be more sacred than another," was invested with "especial sanctity." In 1914 we wiped that pledge finally from our consciences, even more decidedly than we had done 10 years before in the Moroccan treaty. In doing this we refrained from any attempt to define the new position of a vassal Egypt. We neither gave nor even promised a constitution. On the contrary, the semiliberal evolution of the representative assembly—a consultative body with a nominated element, which could, however, veto new direct taxes—which Lord Kitchener began in 1913, came to a sudden stop.

* * * * * * *

As the "war of liberation" came to its end the Egyptians had to look on while the sheriff of Mecca was raised to the status of an independent King, and his son, the Emir Feisul, actually sat as a plenipotentiary at the peace conference. Even India received a certain place, if not her due place, in the new organization of civilization, and her delegates sit at the Washington conference to-day. The Egyptians had their ears open while we perorated about "the right of self-determination," and they asked why the right accorded to their vastly more primitive kinsmen of Arabia should be denied to them.

In another place it is said:

The lash which Lord Cromer was proud of abolishing came out once more.

That is, at the time of the declaration of the protectorate.

* * * * * * *

In Egypt we added economic exploitation to the inhumanity of servile labor. Nor was this all. Egypt swarmed with our troops. It is not we, but Sir Valentine Chirol, who says that they treated the Egyptians as "niggers." The verdict of the Times that our policy has been "reactionary" and our administration "inefficient" is mild censure for this record.

Further along in the article it is said:

The notion of the victors that they can confine their heady doctrine of nationality to the subjects of the defeated Empires is among the most pathetic delusions of history. We have spent five years in liberating Poles, Czechs, Serbs, Esthonians, and the rest. We have now to face the fact that Irishmen, Egyptians, and Indians are also nations.

* * * * * * *

We have here to deal with a nation solid in culture, language, and religion, for even the tiny Coptic minority is ranged to-day with the Moslem mass.

It is time that we asked ourselves to state honestly why it is that we insist on breaking our promise to withdraw from Egypt or why we refuse to apply "the right of self-determination." That right is not satisfied by conceding some guarded form of consultative assembly. It means, if it means anything, the right of a people to choose under what rule it will live. Even if we elect to say that Egyptians, after a generation of our tuition, are still political minors, have we not laid down the principle that such races may choose the power which is to receive a "mandate" to watch over them? We seem to remember that Mr. Lloyd-George proposed to consult the negroes of German Africa before he transferred them to our rule. To refuse a right to Egyptians which we allow to nomad Arabs and the Cameroon tribes is sorry trifling.

It would seem, Mr. President, to call attention to the fact that in adopting this reservation we are simply putting ourselves in harmony with the thought of a great many people of the English nation; and as it is found in the treaty, we certainly can not be charged with seeking to interfere unnecessarily with the internal affairs of Great Britain. If it were not here, as I say, we would not be discussing it; but, as it is here, as the United States must act upon this treaty, it is entitled to express its views with reference to the different terms of the treaty which seem to place a government over peoples which those peoples do not like. It is not in accordance with the spirit of this country or of this Republic to assist in establishing governments over peoples to which they object, and which can be held over them only by force. Great Britain herself can not take offense at this reservation, and it certainly will be an encouraging thing to the people of Egypt.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that this reservation calls for an expression of the Senate of the United States as to the interpretation which England herself places upon her protectorate or suzerainty, or whatever you wish to denominate it; and why should the United States Senate be called upon to place an interpretation upon the relations between Egypt and Great Britain?

Mr. BORAH. Because Great Britain saw fit to insist on its being placed in a treaty which the United States has to sign. There was no occasion in the world for this section going in this treaty, except the desire of those who had the interests of Great Britain at heart to have the affirmative approval of all the powers which should sign this treaty. Germany was out of the situation. There was no occasion for Germany being called upon to recognize this protectorate. There was no occasion for putting it in the treaty, in my judgment, other than to secure the moral support, at least, of the other nations which should sign the treaty. That is the justification for our expressing our views; and if it were not for that, we would not be justified in taking any part in it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will still yield——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that Germany for many years has had in view a policy which would give her the control of Asia Minor from Berlin to Bagdad, and, furthermore, that she would claim, by reason of that policy, some sort of interest, directly or indirectly, in Egypt. It is pretty hard to determine the ramifications of the mind of the Emperor of Germany, prior to the war, and his associates; but does the Senator think there was any impropriety in Great Britain requiring of Germany a renunciation of any interest she might claim in Egypt, and a renunciation of the régime of the capitulations in Egypt? And if Great Britain and Germany felt that article 147 was proper, why should we insist upon placing an interpretation upon the relations between Egypt and Great Britain?

Mr. BORAH. Because it was placed in the treaty which we are called upon to execute. In the first place, the Senator would have some difficulty, in my judgment, upon the fact of assigning any reason why it should be here at all, if it was purely a concern between Great Britain and Germany. As a matter of fact, it was not a concern between Great Britain and Germany. Germany was out. She was, to use a slang phrase, "down and out." It was a matter between Egypt and Great Britain, and upon that question Great Britain undoubtedly desired the moral support of all nations which should sign this treaty. Now, in addition to that, it is a matter of supreme importance to us, because, in my judgment, if any difficulty should arise in reference to Egypt—if the Mohammedan people who are taking offense at Great Britain's action in Persia and in Egypt should go to the extent of bringing war upon us—under article 11 we would be compelled to take action in regard to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word.

I voted for this reservation, or a similar one, when it was last before the Senate. I do not believe in interfering at all in the affairs of other countries; but in the case of Shantung and in the case of Egypt we are made participants in those provisions because they are embodied in the treaty. Now, if we are to be made participants in any of these arrangements—and we can not avoid it, because they are part of the treaty—I should like to see the attitude of the United States stated just as we stated it in regard to Shantung, and I wanted it stated in regard to Egypt. The reason I want it is because I desire no mistake about the attitude of the United States, and to take us out rather than to involve us in these foreign difficulties.

In England itself, as the Senator from Idaho has pointed out, there is a very strong feeling that the pledges made for the last quarter of a century and more by Mr. Gladstone and others are still predominant. I saw it stated in the newspapers that Lord Milner, who is one of the ablest men in public life in England, had come out against annexation. That may be a mistake in the press, but there is no doubt that that has been said. All I wish now is that we should make our position perfectly clear, for we ought not to be involved in any of these things, where the fates of other peoples are involved, without the world knowing just where we stand.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in making some opposition on yesterday to this proposed reservation I did so with little thought in my mind other than to counteract, as I believed, some impressions that had been conveyed in regard to the rule of Great Britain in Egypt. I think the impression received from some of the discussions here in the Senate must have been to the effect that England's rule had been misrule from the time she began the occupation of Egypt back in 1882, and I tried in a way to refute that idea, and I cited, as I believed, some very respectable authorities to show that England's rule in Egypt had meant the material advancement and to a great degree the enlightenment of the Egyptian people. I thought English rule in Egypt had been for their material good especially.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] quotes liberally from the Nation, which, he says, expresses the sentiment of at least a part of the English people. I do not doubt that; I think it probably does; but, on the other hand, Mr. President, there is a question, and a grave one, under present conditions, as I tried to show yesterday, whether Great Britain should now, at this very time relinquish her protectorate over Egypt. I quoted from a dispatch sent from Cairo March 13. While I have not the dispatch itself before me, or the newspaper containing it, I refer again to some things in the dispatch, as found in the RECORD, and which I again quote, as follows:

> Although the future of Egypt seems encouraging, the present is fraught with danger, and the interim between now and eventual Egyptian self-government might even see Bolshevism unless stern measures of a temporary nature are taken. Fear is expressed here that the new social movement now afoot in Egypt is transcending the nationalist agitation against England.

Further:

> Even a superficial observer can see that the seeds of southern Europe's unrest have a fertile field here, where the people are famous in history for their turbulent spirit. To-day they have a real economic and an imagined political grievance.

And I can not help but think, Mr. President, that their political grievance is to a large extent imaginary.

Now, as to the political status of Egypt, I want to read a little further. This is from the New York Times' Current History of the European War, volume 12, at page 411:

THE POLITICAL STATUS OF EGYPT.

> The present political status of Egypt is an example of the innate conservatism—in the sense of conservation—which has marked all England's dealings with oriental peoples, and notably with the peoples of India. For while, as a result of Turkey's entry into the war and England's command of the sea, British power was extended over Egypt in December, 1914, Egypt becoming in effect an integral part of the British Empire, England nevertheless conserved all details of the existing administration, except that the title of Khedive hitherto borne by the native ruler was changed to Sultan. As the former Khedive had thrown in his lot with Turkey and the central powers, he was declared deposed, and Hussein Kamil Pasha was put at the head of the Egyptian Government, with the title of Sultan. The present Sultan of Egypt, born in 1854, is the son of Ismail I, who was forced to abdicate under pressure of the British and French Governments in 1879, and is the eighth in descent from Muhammed Ali, appointed governor in 1805, who threw off Turkish domination six years later, though a money tribute was still paid to Turkey.

Now, how is the administration of Egypt carried on, Mr. President, at present? This article tells us:

> The administration of Egypt is carried out by a native ministry acting under the Sultan, but England exercises, through a financial adviser, a decisive influence over the acts of the Egyptian Government.

I showed yesterday, as I thought quite conclusively, Mr. President, the benefits that had been derived by Egypt through the financial administration given by England.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. By whom and upon whose nomination are the ministers appointed?

Mr. STERLING. They are not appointed, all of them, anyhow, by Great Britain. I think they are appointed in pursuance of the Egyptian constitution. I do not think they are appointees of the Crown of Great Britain.

Mr. McCORMICK. Can the Senator tell us specifically by whom they are appointed?

Mr. STERLING. I would not venture to state absolutely.

Mr. McCORMICK. I will give the information to the Senator. They are appointed upon the nomination of the high commissioner and by the Sultan, who, of course, has been appointed by the King.

Mr. STERLING. Very well; that may be true. I am not questioning the Senator from Illinois in that regard.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me add that in each ministry there is a British adviser to the minister.

Mr. STERLING. Reading further, I should like to have the Senator from Illinois note what I am about to read:

> In July, 1913, certain existing councils were replaced by a new legislative assembly, which includes the ministers, 66 elected members, and 17 members nominated by the Government to represent minorities.

That is not by the Government of Great Britain, I think, but by the Egyptian Government.

Mr. McCORMICK. What are the powers of the assembly?

Mr. STERLING. I can not give you all the powers now. Perhaps the Senator from Illinois can. But according to this article—

> The elected members hold office for six years, one-third being elected every two years, as in the United States Senate. This legislative assembly has a considerable voice in law making and taxation. There are 10,000,000 Mohammedans in Egypt, or 90 per cent of the population; the Copts, 700,000 in number, who are the descendants of the ancient Egyptians, are the next largest element.

So, Mr. President, in view of English rule in Egypt in the past and in view of present conditions and circumstances, I do not think the Senate of the United States wants to be in a position of now advising England as to what she should do in regard to her protectorate over Egypt. I have confidence in the English rule and the good intentions of her statesmen. I believe her ministers have now determined that as soon as practicable, as soon as it is safe for the people of Egypt themselves, they will withdraw the protectorate.

I can not help but think that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is more or less inconsistent in his position in favor of this reservation. He has contended against the principle of interference, and I think, perhaps, a little more vigorously and a little more eloquently than anyone else in the Senate, and yet here he proposes to interfere by advising Great Britain what she shall do with her protectorate over Egypt.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, does not the reservation, on the contrary, withhold any interference on the part of the United States?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, no.

Mr. McCORMICK. The treaty would join us in an overt act of recognition.

Mr. STERLING. Why should we say anything about the protectorate of England over Egypt?

Mr. McCORMICK. Why should the treaty say anything about it?

Mr. STERLING. It is Germany that recognizes the protectorate of England over Egypt, according to the terms of the treaty, and it was highly desirable, I think, that England should have a provision of that kind in the treaty.

Mr. President, the former Khedive of Egypt, the Khedive in 1914 and after the breaking out of the war, was friendly to the Turkish and to the German cause, and that is the reason why he was replaced and a Khedive who was friendly put in his stead. We may judge, Mr. President, how it was in the interest of the great cause for which we all fought, and in the interest of civilization itself, that Great Britain should at that time assume that power and carry it out.

However, the language of this reservation as framed, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, being uncalled for, it must be meant as advice to England, and for that reason I am opposed to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it seems to me that the reservation of the Senator from Oklahoma does involve this country in a dispute with Great Britain as to the nature of its protectorate over Egypt, and I do not think that this country ought to take any part in that; I do not think it is any of our business.

As I understand the provisions of the treaty, Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain December 18, 1914. Germany yields certain things and renounces certain things to Great Britain and to Egypt, and that is all, as I recall it. We simply consent to it. Do we wish to object to the renunciation of Germany? Have we any objection to that? I do not care if they drive Germany out of every possession in the world.

Mr. President, there is nothing in this treaty that defines the nature of Great Britain's protectorate, as I read it, and by signing the treaty or consenting to the treaty we do not define the protectorate of Great Britain at all. We simply consent to the renunciation of Germany and her acknowledgment of Great Britain's protectorate as stated in the treaty.

The reservation goes further. It says:

> The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

That may be true; it may not be true. That is outside of the question, and I do not think it should be placed in a reservation to the treaty, and for the same reason I objected to our stating the nature of the understanding between Japan and China and guaranteeing that it be carried out. I simply thought in that case that we should take no part in it. I see no objection in this case, however, to our consenting to the renunciation of Germany.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield the floor.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to ask the Senator a question, inasmuch as he alluded to the provisions under articles 149, and so forth, referring to the capitulation. The reservation does not bear upon the renunciation of the capitulation. It deals only with the protectorate, as the treaty says, proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain December 18, 1914. There is no reference to the capitulation.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is quite true.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator from Minnesota will turn to the corresponding clause dealing with the Sherifian Government and the protectorate over Morocco, he will note that in both texts there is very clear distinction in the language from that used in relation to Egypt. The one refers to a protectorate existing; the other acknowledges and recognizes the formation of a protectorate, a change in the political status of Egypt in international law. I think that the distinction is worth the attention of so well read a lawyer as the Senator from Minnesota, and one so learned in international law.

Mr. KELLOGG. My answer to the Senator is that, so far as the Egyptian clause is concerned, Germany simply recognizes the protectorate. There is nothing in that which defines what that protectorate is. Here it is proposed that we shall undertake to define it in a reservation, and it seems to me that we are going outside of our duty.

Mr. McCORMICK. Surely the Senator realizes that a protectorate of itself has a status in international law.

Mr. KELLOGG. I recognize that; but I do not think we should undertake in this treaty to define that protectorate or state how long it shall last.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going over the ground that I went over the other day, because I went over it somewhat in detail. I want to refer, however, to the argument of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] and the argument of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

In the first place, before I do that, I want to call attention to the reservation itself. It seems to me that the mildest of the mild reservationists could have no possible objection to this reservation. It is as harmless as a reservation could be drawn, it seems to me, and mean anything.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senator forgets that all the reservationists have been put in the same class.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, there certainly is no such thing as a mild reservationist, and nobody but a mild reservationist can object to this reservation. Therefore there could be no objection to it.

The reservation does not go as far as I think we ought to go. I have consented to the reservation and not to offer any stronger reason, because it seemed to be desired to propose a reservation that would meet with no opposition; and I confess, Mr. President, that I am surprised that anyone can object to this reservation.

The proposed reservation reads:

> The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

That statement is as true as the Holy Bible. That is all that protectorate was. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] goes on to argue how well Egyptians have done under English rule. Bless you, this protectorate was not proclaimed by England until December, 1914. If there was no protectorate, or if England would do what this reservation intimates we think she ought to do, then Egypt would go back to the status which existed prior to the time when England proclaimed the protectorate, excepting that she would not be a part of the Turkish Empire, and all this beautiful condition that the Senator from South Dakota has described would immediately be in full force and effect.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think the reservation which has been suggested is a recognition of the fact that there is a protectorate, that one has been proclaimed, but seeks to limit its duration or at least to limit the time within which it shall operate, whereas if we have no reservation at all we do not place ourselves upon record as having conceded that there ever was a protectorate?

The mere fact that the treaty says that Germany recognizes the protectorate of Great Britain over Egypt does not commit the United States, or any other signatory to the treaty, to the proposition that there has been or is a protectorate.

It seems to me that the adoption of the reservation is logically against the very position for which the Senator is contending. It puts us in the position of having recognized that there has been and now is a protectorate by Great Britain over Egypt.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish I could take that view of this matter. I wish I could bring myself to the conclusion that the Senator from Utah is right. I have no disposition here or elsewhere, now or at any time, to interfere with the affairs of Europe, but article 147 of the treaty, unless we have some reservation, as I understand it, is a positive recognition of the complete force of that protectorate through all time by the British Government.

Article 147 reads:

> Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914—

And so forth.

If in this treaty we require our enemy to recognize a thing, does it not follow that we recognize it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. The treaty with Austria, which we have not yet considered, contains the same proposition. There is, in my judgment, no use in putting it into the treaty at all. I do not believe it is at all important to ask Germany to recognize this protectorate, but when we say to our enemy you must recognize so-and-so as being a fact, and then turn in the next breath and say we do not recognize it, we have a contradiction absolutely in terms.

I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thought I understood the Senator to say that the protectorate declared by Great Britain on December 18, 1914, was simply to exist during the war.

Mr. NORRIS. I said it was a war measure only.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is all that Germany recognizes.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the treaty makes a permanent thing of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Where?

Mr. NORRIS. In the article I have just read.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me read it and see if it does.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may read it again, though I just finished reading it.

Mr. KELLOGG (reading):

> Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914, and that she renounces—

And so forth. Where is there any declaration that that lasts for all time?

Mr. NORRIS. It follows from its own terms. The Senator laughs at it, and indicates probably, by an expression that can not be gotten into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that anybody ought to know enough to know that; but I plead my ignorance. I admit I have not such a good education. My education was limited. I can only do the best I can.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is mistaken. I made no reflection upon his education.

Mr. NORRIS. But I will submit it to any schoolboy from the eighth grade to the high school, if that construction is not right. I do not believe it requires a college man or a lawyer or a United States Senator to realize that when we say to Germany, "You must recognize this protectorate," we are recognizing it now as an existing condition at this moment, and there is no limit to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator to contend—and if I am in error I apologize to the Senator—that the terms of the protectorate itself when it was promulgated by Great Britain fixed the period of limitation and declared that it was only during the period of the war.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I did not contend that. I have been into it once, but I will go into it again and say why I think that is what it meant.

Mr. KING. The Senator, as I understood him, stated that it was a fact that the protectorate was to extend only during the period of the war.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I said it was a war measure. I was using the language of the reservation. I still contend that it was a war measure and nothing else, and by this treaty we are putting it away beyond what it was supposed to be.

When that protectorate was proclaimed the King of England, at the time he proclaimed it, sent this message to the Khedive of Egypt. Listen to it:

> On the occasion when Your Highness enters upon your high office I desire to convey to Your Highness the expression of my most sincere friendship and the assurance of my unfailing support in safeguarding the integrity of Egypt and in securing her future well-being and prosperity.
> Your Highness has been called upon to undertake the responsibilities of your high office at a grave crisis in the national life of Egypt, and I feel convinced that you will be able, with the cooperation of your ministers and the protection of Great Britain, to successfully overcome all the influences which are seeking to destroy the independence of Egypt and the wealth, liberty, and happiness of the people.

Now, Mr. President, that was done after Egypt had declared war against Germany. That was done right after Turkey went into the war. We must remember that within a few days after the war began Egypt declared war against Germany, and she fought from the beginning to the end of that war as our ally. Turkey went into the war in December, I think, 1914, and immediately England proclaimed this protectorate because, as she said in official messages, "Turkey will attack Egypt." That was the most natural thing, and Turkey did so, and England gave the world and the Egyptian people to understand that she put this protectorate over Egypt in order to protect the integrity of Egypt, as stated in the King's message.

Listen to the answer that the Khedive sent to that beautiful message of the King. He said, in reply:

> I present to Your Majesty the expression of my deepest gratitude for the feelings of friendship with which you see fit to honor me, and for the assurance of your valuable support in safeguarding the integrity and independence of Egypt.

That shows what she understood, and it was the only fair understanding. That shows what the world understood when this was done, and that is all that this reservation says and nothing else. There can be no insult to the English Government from this reservation. We are only saying in this reservation what, as a matter of fact, is true, and the whole world knew it and knows it now.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] says that Egypt did well under the administration of affairs as they were administered in her Government by England. This does not interfere with that. It puts it back on that very plane. This reservation has nothing to do with that. I am contending, however, that that is not a good reason why any nation should proclaim a protectorate over another, simply because that nation says we can govern you better than you can govern yourselves. Remember that Egypt had governed herself for years and years, and since 1840 she was practically independent except for the nominal suzerainty of Turkey, and all that that meant was that she paid Turkey an annual tribute of $3,500,000. She had her own officers, she had her own legislature. England had more influence in the Egyptian Government than Turkey, although nominally Egypt was a part of the Turkish Empire, with that one string of $3,500,000 which attached her to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I wish to ask the Senator when the United States first had information that England intended to establish a protectorate permanently over Egypt?

Mr. NORRIS. There never has been any other information than what is contained in the treaty. As soon as Turkey went into the war England notified the world of this protectorate that she had. These dispatches that I have read of the King and the answer of the Khedive were published all over the world at the time they were given. The whole world knew it, and no one thought of such a thing as this being a permanent affair.

There is no reason on earth why this article should be in the treaty at all except that England gains by it in her Empire 13,000,000 unwilling people. Do not forget, Mr. President, that those 13,000,000 people were loyal on the side of the Allies from the beginning to the end of the war. One million two hundred thousand Egyptians were in the war on the side of the Allies. When Turkey first went into the war, the first thing she did was to make an attempt to capture the Suez Canal. It was Egypt that prevented it. It was Egyptian soldiers under Allenby who to a great extent made the great victory over Turkey possible, and you will remember that that was the first great landslide down hill of Germany and her allies.

To say now, even if all that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has said were true, that England can govern Egypt better than Egypt can govern herself, is contrary to what we said we went into the war for, what we said we were fighting the war for, and what every one of the Allies said they were fighting the war for. How would you like it, Mr. President, if England proclaimed a protectorate over the United States and said, "We can govern you better than you can govern yourselves"? Would we argue the question with her as to whether she could govern us better? It may be that there are some people in the United States, and, perhaps, some in the Senate who are so mindful of the interests of Great Britain that they would argue that she could do it; they might say, "She can govern us better than we can govern ourselves; she has had great experience; and we would be better off if we were under the control of the British Government."

But even those people would not for a moment want her to do it; they would say, "We will govern ourselves, even though it is not done quite as well as you might do it; we prefer to do it in our own way, and we will struggle along in our own way."

You might for the same reason go into your neighbor's family and tell him that you can manage his domestic affairs better than he, and perhaps you could; he might be willing to admit it; but he would not let you in just the same. That applies to Egypt.

I deny, however, that Egypt will be better governed by Great Britain; I think I demonstrated that contention a few days ago when I went into details and showed just what had been done there; but I submit, Mr. President, that that is absolutely immaterial. If we concede, to begin with, that Egypt is able to govern herself—and no man for the last 100 years anywhere in the civilized world has questioned it—then there is no reason why we should let any other government reach out and put its hand on Egypt and say, "We will govern you because we can do it better than you can do it."

There might be some reason in this if Egypt had been fighting on the other side, but Egypt fed Allenby's army in addition to supplying it with several hundred thousand soldiers; Egypt fed, to a great extent, the army in Bulgaria; she supplied cotton to Great Britain which Great Britain needed to carry on the war and to make munitions of war; she saved the Suez Canal from capture. After that splendid record shall we say, "Your independence is ended; you shall go under the British flag against your wish and your will"?

All this reservation does is to say that we regard the British protectorate as a war measure only. This reservation has no binding effect, Mr. President, on England; it has nothing to do with the approval of the treaty by anybody but ourselves. England can say, notwithstanding this reservation, "We regard this protectorate as a permanent and continuous thing." The reservation has no legal effect. The only effect it can possibly have is a moral one. I think we but carry out the policy held from the beginning by the forefathers of our Government when we say, "We will not consent; you can go on and do this if you want to, so far as this reservation is concerned; but we do not give our consent; we construe the protectorate to mean a war measure only, as England did at the time she issued the mandate."

I can not conceive of putting article 147 into the treaty for any other reason than with the idea of getting the remainder of the world, when approving the treaty, to approve this addition to the British Empire. Should we do so, I think we should be unfair toward one of our own allies, whose loyalty was never questioned; whose sacrifices were great, indeed; who lost more men in the war than we did; whose soldiers have died all through Palestine, all through Mesopotamia; and, as one British writer said, who was on the Gallipoli Peninsula, that disastrous campaign for England, the Egyptians died there like flies. We owe it to them, Mr. President, at least to go far enough to say that we consider that protectorate to have been a war measure, and not to give our consent to article 147 of the treaty without making some reservation of the kind proposed by the pending reservation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in the form in which the reservation is presented I do not find it objectionable, nor can I agree with Senators who have declared that the adoption of the reservation by the Senate would be an unwarranted interference with the affairs of Great Britain. This reservation is purely explanatory of the understanding of the United States in agreeing to article 147 as a part of the great treaty of peace which has been presented to the Senate, under which article—

> Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914.

There can be no impropriety, in my opinion, in the United States, in assenting to this article, giving expression to its understanding as to the meaning of the article, in view of the history of the British occupation in Egypt and the history of the British protectorate over Egypt.

In 1882 a British Army occupied Egypt. Sir Beauchamp Seymour made the following declaration:

> I, admiral, commanding the British Fleet, think it opportune to confirm without delay once more to Your Highness that the Government of Great Britain has no intention of making the conquest of Egypt. * * * It has for its sole object to protect Your Highness and the Egyptian people against rebels.

That declaration has been substantially reaffirmed from 1882 until the present by almost every British statesman who has spoken with reference to the relations between Great Britain and Egypt. I will not consume the time of the Senate by repeating in detail the declaration made by Mr. Gladstone in 1882, nor that of Lord Granville, Lord Cromer, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Asquith, and other prominent British statesmen, all at various times representing themselves as speaking with authority. Every declaration was to the effect that the British occupation of Egypt was temporary and solely for the protection of the existing Egyptian Government against rebels; and, indeed, the record justifies the conclusion that there was also the purpose to enforce the collection of certain debts.

When Egypt took her stand with the Allies, Turkey, which was exercising a nominal supervision over Egypt, made war against Egypt; and the King of Great Britain declared a protectorate, the protectorate referred to in article 147, on behalf of the British Government over Egypt. The sole purpose expressed by the King of Great Britain was the protection of Egypt against her enemy.

The United States recognized that protectorate, and the understanding of the United States, as expressed by representatives of the State Department, is to the effect that it was a righteous and necessary measure, and that it was not intended as a renunciation of the policy theretofore declared by Great Britain during its occupancy of Egypt, namely, to exercise mere temporary control.

Great Britain in this treaty has presented for the indorsement of the United States a contract with Germany which, as stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], really affects most vitally the people of Egypt. The United States is asked to give its approval to this contract, and, in giving that approval, there is no impropriety and no injustice to Great Britain in this Government making plain what is its understanding of the contract. The necessity and propriety for this reservation are both justified and emphasized by the course of recent diplomatic history. The British Embassy in Washington on December 2, 1919, said:

> Great Britain has carefully avoided destroying the sovereignty of Egypt.

Mr. Balfour, who throughout his long and illustrious career as an authority of the British Government, has repeatedly declared that the British occupation of Egypt was merely temporary and for the benefit of the Egyptian people. He is quoted as saying in the House of Commons, on December 18, 1918:

> British supremacy exists; British supremacy is going to be maintained; and let nobody, either in Egypt or out of Egypt, make any mistake upon that cardinal principle of His Majesty's Government.

In view of these conflicting declarations as to the policy of the British Government toward Egypt, it is both proper and just that the United States, in agreeing to this article of the treaty, should express its understanding as to the meaning of it. I do not want to estop my Government hereafter from saying it is not in sympathy with the policy of permanent British control of Egypt, should such a policy be advanced by Great Britain.

If Senators concede the accuracy of the history to which I have referred, if they recognize that it is true that the present British protectorate was established by King George on December 18, 1914, for the sole purpose of protecting Egypt against her enemies, then what can be the objection to the United States in indorsing this contract between Germany and Great Britain—a contract which Germany was coerced to sign—declaring that our understanding of the protectorate is that it is temporary.

The pending reservation does not fix the political status of Egypt; it does not assume to declare the future duty of Great Britain toward Egypt; it merely explains our understanding of this provision of the treaty; and if this reservation correctly interprets that provision of the treaty, then it does not lie in our mouth to say that we ought to agree to an arrangement by which Egypt may have the alleged benefits of permanent British control.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALDER in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I feel about the continued British occupation of Egypt very much as the Senator does, and I do not think they are justified in staying there after the promises they have made; but what I want to ask the Senator is this: The Senator states that this reservation simply expresses our understanding that England will retire from Egypt.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the Senator is inaccurate in that statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator correct me, then?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I shall be glad to do so. This reservation simply expresses the understanding of the United States that the protectorate referred to in article 147, namely, the protectorate declared by King George on December 18, 1914, was a temporary measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war. That reservation, as I understand it, expresses truly the historical facts.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not denying that.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator pleases, it does not commit this Government to a policy of compelling Great Britain to evacuate Egypt.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. It merely expresses the understanding of the United States that the protectorate was of the nature expressed in the reservation, namely, to preserve the independence of Egypt.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would the Senator be kind enough to permit me to proceed a moment longer, or does he wish to interrupt now?

Mr. OWEN. I should like to interrupt now, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. OWEN. I merely wanted to point out that the reservation did not deal with the future, it only interpreted what had occurred.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now that I am in possession of a more correct interpretation of what the reservation proposes, I want to come to the point which I think is equally applicable to either interpretation, and that is this:

In view of the fact that we have not yet determined upon the form of the so-called preamble, which is to provide something like this—that this resolution of ratification is upon condition that these reservations are made a part of the understanding and that the other powers have to agree to our understanding about it, either by active assent or by an assumed assent arising from the fact that they do not object to it—then does it not, in the opinion of the Senator, make it something more in effect than merely our understanding?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In other words, is it not going to result, if the ratification is to take place, that England has to agree to do what we say our understanding is?

Mr. ROBINSON. England undoubtedly, if she accepts the exchange of ratifications, will have to agree that that is our understanding of article 147.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The object of my inquiry is this: As a practical thing, will it not create a situation where we say that we will not ratify the treaty and enter the league unless Great Britain does agree that she will act according to our understanding?

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I wanted information upon.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will make it perfectly clear to the Senator, if I have not already done so. With the exception of the single declaration from Mr. Balfour, delivered in the House of Commons, and which I read a few moments ago, delivered on November 18, 1919, and a similar statement by Lord Curzon, there is absolutely nothing in the announced policy of the British Government to indicate that she has reversed her declarations made when the protectorate was established and now seeks to annex Egypt to Great Britain. This reservation, I repeat and reaffirm, does not control or seek to control the future policy or the action of Great Britain. It can not do that. It merely puts the United States on record as having said that "in agreeing to this treaty we do not recognize your control in Egypt as a permanent control. We recognize it as merely temporary."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know; but is it not designed to notify Great Britain, in effect, that we hold her to carrying out the proclamation she made during the war?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; it is designed to notify Great Britain that when she asks us to indorse her contract respecting Egypt, in indorsing that contract we place this construction on it, and our liability under that contract is limited by the construction which we make. That is as clear a statement of my understanding of the meaning of it as I can make.

I have not the slightest doubt that Great Britain desires the United States to adopt this article unqualifiedly, and I have not the slightest doubt, as other Senators have suggested, that she had a purpose in having the article incorporated; but that this reservation would prevent an exchange of ratifications I do not think is serious likelihood. I do not think any such result could possibly occur, for the reason that the reservation, as I have already stated, is consistent with the true historical facts.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, of course, the Senator intends it to have a very persuasive influence upon the action of Great Britain in relation to Egypt, does he not?

Mr. ROBINSON. The only purpose I have in supporting the reservation is to refrain from committing my Government to a policy of permanent British control in Egypt and to continue the policy that this Government has heretofore pursued with respect to the subject. Great Britain, in so far as I am concerned, and so far, I think, as this reservation is concerned, will determine her own policy as to the future of Egypt; but the United States Government will not be estopped from taking the position which she has heretofore occupied, that the protectorate involved in this article is a temporary one.

I do not care to go into that feature of the subject which was raised by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], namely, that the best interests of the Egyptian people require a permanent British control of Egypt. I recall, however, that since 1882 Great Britain levied a tax of 8 per cent on coal imported by Egypt, the evident purpose being to prevent the establishment of manufactories there. I also recall that she levied an excise duty of 8 per cent on manufactured cotton goods, the object being to suppress manufacturing in Egypt, and that object was accomplished.

I rest this case, in so far as I am concerned, solely on the ground that the United States ought not at this time to commit itself to the policy of permanent British control in Egypt; that there is neither necessity nor justification for doing so; and that the facts relating to British control in Egypt justify the reservation presented by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I believe that it is the intention of Great Britain to retain permanent control over Egypt. In the history of the British Empire the instances are rare, if any, wherever the British Empire got control of a country that it released that control. It has been said by a prominent Englishman in Parliament during this treaty controversy that Great Britain has always obtained some territory, some subjects, and some commercial advantages out of every war that has ever occurred and every treaty that has been made in the world; and history will prove the truth of his statement. It takes occasion in all instances to strengthen its power and to extend its dominions, and in my opinion it will never leave Egypt until forced to do so.

Whether it is best for the Egyptians for the English to be there is not a question, in my opinion, for the United States. I do not care to discuss that; but as to the views of the English on the subject, I wish to read what a prominent Englishman connected with this treaty has said.

The Earl of Curzon, when the treaty was presented to the House of Lords, said:

> But it is permissible, perhaps, to point out in a sentence that Great Britain has gained in the war all and, indeed, much more than all, she set out to win. Our navy remains at the end of the war intact and unassailed. The principle of freedom of the seas, which is the basis of our national existence, stands unimpaired and unimpugned. The British protectorate of Egypt is provided for in one of the clauses of this treaty. We are demobilizing our forces, but we can not lay down our arms; we can not disband them altogether. We must still be able to fight for what we have won, and be sure that it is not taken from us after we have won it.

That is as clear and as positive a declaration as possible of Great Britain's permanent occupation of Egypt. In other words, it has got it recognized and guaranteed by this treaty. That, I think, is the view of Great Britain, and not that it is merely a temporary affair there.

Mr. President, I firmly believe in the doctrine of the fathers that the United States should not interfere in the affairs of foreign countries; that we should have no entangling alliances with foreign Governments; that we should remain free, sovereign, and independent, as in the past, ready and willing to do the just, the righteous, and the generous thing whenever occasion requires; and I believe the American people can be trusted to do that without being bound in bonds, or without subjecting itself to the orders of a supergovernment or the dictation of any power or number of powers on earth, and I believe it should be free to do so.

Upon that principle I have supported reservations. I have advanced that view in the few remarks I have made to the Senate, and I stand by it. I think the reservation now proposed is a departure from that doctrine. I do not think we ought to interfere in the political relations of Egypt and England.

I do not think we ought to in any way, directly or indirectly, involve ourselves in them, as possibly in good faith we would be required to furnish our Army or our Navy to support the independence of Egypt or the protectorate of the British Government. For that reason I think this reservation is inconsistent with the settled policy of our country.

But if this reservation is to be included, Mr. President, in the resolution of ratification of this treaty, I have one in mind that I think also ought to be included. We have comparatively few Egyptians or citizens of Egyptian descent in the United States. We have no treaty with Egypt; we have very few relations of any kind with her people, comparatively speaking, that we should interest ourselves to the extent of involving our Government, directly or indirectly, in its affairs. We have not any sentimental reason for doing so.

But there is a country which Great Britain has cruelly oppressed and which it has held in chains of slavery for 700 years, notwithstanding its continued brave struggles for liberty and self-government during all that time. It is a country entitled to self-government as much as Canada or Australia or New Zealand or India. I mean, as every Senator here knows, Ireland.

We have here in the United States 20,000,000 people of Irish descent, with a love for the land of their fathers which is imperishable and a deep interest in those they have left behind them. Ireland is suffering under the government of a foreign people. It has within the last less than a half century lost one-half of its population. Its commerce, manufactures, and agriculture have been destroyed by discriminating laws passed by the Parliament of Great Britain, and its inhabitants have been reduced to pauperism and forced to seek refuge and homes in other countries.

Ireland is struggling for self-government; it is struggling for recognition as a free and independent government. It is the superior in every respect of many that we are recognizing in this treaty. Would any man compare Ireland with Haiti, or Liberia, or Hedjaz? The Irish people are as enlightened, civilized, and capable of self-government as any of those of the members of the proposed league.

All the members of the league are recognized as independent nations, on an equality with all other nations. Why not Ireland?

Mr. President, if the reservation of the Senator from Oklahoma is to be adopted, let us go further and do something for the country of the forefathers of 20,000,000 of the best people in our land who are descendants of emigrants from Ireland. They are good citizens, they are law-abiding people, they are patriotic, they have come to the front every time the United States Government was in danger. They are always quick to respond to the call of arms, and no better soldiers ever lived. The Irish have given greater glory to the English arms than the English themselves.

They have furnished the greatest generals and the bravest troops in the wars of England for a century. They have fought bravely and patriotically in every war in which America has been engaged. They are to be found in the forefront in all the trades, professions, and other avocations in America.

Ireland has the right to be free and to govern her own people. It has a right to take its place as a free and independent member of the family of nations, and her people will never cease their brave struggle until this right is accorded them.

I stand by the American doctrine of noninterference and nonentangling alliances, a doctrine so fixed and consistently adhered to for 140 years that it has been engrafted upon the fundamental laws of this country, and the President and the Senate have no right to violate it without first submitting the question to the people of the United States. But if this reservation in favor of Egypt is to be adopted, we ought also to adopt one in favor of Ireland, and I now offer this amendment:

The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principles of self-determination of peoples and equality of all Governments said to pervade and underlie the covenant of the League of Nations, Great Britain will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the Republic of Ireland, and agree that it shall become a member of the League of Nations with equal representation, accorded to all other sovereign and independent Governments.

Mr. President, I think this is necessary in order to clarify our relations with Great Britain and Ireland under this treaty. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas that it might be necessary to pass the Egyptian reservation to make clear our relations with the Egyptian protectorate. This reservation is necessary in order to show that under article 10 and article 11 of this treaty we do not commit ourselves to maintain the British sovereignty over Ireland. It is as necessary in one case as in another. We should make our position clear and explicit and solemnly declare that we do not commit ourselves, by the obligations of the covenant, to the permanent control of Great Britain over the Irish people. Without some declaration upon this subject the obligation is there. I can not see how any Senator favoring the reservation in favor of the Egyptian people can fail to favor this one in favor of Ireland.

I send my amendment to the desk.

Mr. OWEN. I make the point of order that the reservation is not germane to the subject-matter.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is no such point of order known to Senate procedure.

Mr. SHIELDS. I had hoped the Senator from Oklahoma would be impressed with the justice of the reservation, and accept it. But certainly there is no such point of order known to the rules or practice of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator, of course, is merely indulging a little humor, because the obvious effect of the amendment is to prevent the adoption of the reservation itself.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the wrongs of the Irish people are not a subject of humor, but of most serious consideration in any legislative body or in any assembly of American people.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say a word about the Egyptian question and about the amendment relating to Ireland which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] has offered.

We have had occasion, and we are having occasions now, to witness a test of the very principles which it is alleged lie at the foundation of the League of Nations. It is to test them on paper, and yet I apprehend that the majority of the Senate will fear even to vote for a thing that under the League of Nations they pledge this country to fight for. I think they are going to draw back from a mere expression by a resolution of a hope that the doctrine of self-determination is to be recognized. I think they are going to flinch from saying by a mere resolution that liberty of small peoples ought to be recognized, and yet they propose to adopt a covenant here that binds the United States to pour out its blood and treasure to do the thing they will not dare vote for to-day.

We are in a singular situation. The advocates of the treaty declare that its chief purpose is to protect small nations, but on every occasion when they are asked to protect any people, even by a resolution or a vote, they declare that it is none of our business. Let us look at this a little bit.

When you set up the League of Nations you admit that you are doing it for the purpose of protecting the different peoples of the world. That is what you say its object is, but the moment you are asked to pass a resolution declaring that Ireland ought to be free or that Egypt ought to have her chains broken you say it is none of your business. That is the very business of the League of Nations, if it has any business at all. The President has so declared time and again. He has said that that is the real purpose of this instrument.

What a singular thing for Senators to sit in their seats and refuse in a resolution to specify the things that ought to be done on the ground that it is none of our business, and yet they are setting up a world government to make it our business.

The man who stands where the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] stands, declaring that the United States ought to have no League of Nations, that it ought to stay at home, that it ought to observe the old principles of our Government and remain free from entangling alliances, to observe the doctrine of neutrality, stands upon solid and safe ground; but the man who says that we ought to go abroad and that we ought to democratize the world, that we ought to protect the small peoples, that we ought to insist upon the right of self-determination, that we ought to set up a supersovereignty in this world to govern all the world can not possibly stand before the bar of common sense and declare that it is none of our business what happens to Egypt or what happens to Ireland, because the very purpose of the instrument that he proposes to foist upon the American people makes all these questions the business of the league of which we are to be a constituent part if, unfortunately, we are ever dragged into it.

Why, you repudiate your own doctrines and your own purposes before the instrument is formed. You may think the American people will not find it out, but they will. Think of the spectacle a Senator is going to cut on the platform when the question is asked, "Why did you not vote for self-determination on the part of Ireland?" Answer, "Because that was none of our business." "Then, why did you vote to set up a government that proposes to control and rule the world and protect small peoples and surrender our sovereignty to that government to bring about those ends?" What is the answer to be? The answer will stick in the throat of the man who tries to make it.

What is the purpose of this League of Nations except to do the very thing this reservation calls for? The President said, speaking of the terms of peace:

Impartial justice in every item of settlement, no matter whose interest is crossed, and not only impartial justice, but also the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are to be dealt with.

And yet the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] this morning, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] yesterday, and again this morning, in substance declared that this was none of our business and, although we are making the very settlement the President outlined, that we have not any right to say that impartial justice shall be done to mankind.

What is the ground the proleaguers occupy, anyway? Are they in favor of carrying out this great world scheme and bringing equity and justice to all the councils of the world, or are they in favor of a league of nations that is not to do that thing? If so, why do they want the League of Nations? The purpose was declared by the President in the language I have just given.

But in addition to that, the President made some other statements. On July 4, 1918, he said:

There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise; no half-way decision is conceivable. These are the things for which the associated people of the world are fighting, and which must be conceded them before there can be peace or the settlement of every question, whether of territory or sovereignty or economic arrangement or of political relationship upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of their own influence or mastery.

Those who have followed the President, those who are following him now in his League of Nations, stand upon that principle that there must be a complete settlement of every question, whether of territory or of sovereignty, and that that settlement must be "upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon a basis of the material interest or advantage of any nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of their own influence or mastery."

And now we have presented a reservation which proposes that we will, in a very cowardly, half-hearted sort of way, insist upon that doctrine as to Egypt. We do not say, as we would say if we were brave enough to stand on the President's declaration, "The United States insists, as a part of the settlement of peace, that the 13,000,000 people of Egypt shall be granted full sovereignty."

I repeat, for I can not say it too often, that the men who tell us we are setting up a government here to compose the differences of the world and to bring justice to all nations, and who proposes in the covenant to back it by the blood of our sons, are afraid to back it by a resolution passed in the Senate. They are afraid to say here by a simple resolution that we express the hope that the thing will be done which you bind us by the League of Nations to spend our blood and treasure to accomplish.

When the future historian seeks to write the story of phariseeism, he will be obliged to pay some attention to the most dignified legislative body on earth. I challenge you league men to answer why you are not willing to say by a paper resolution that the very thing shall be done that the President said was the soul of the settlement and which he has repeatedly declared is the essence of the league.

Again the President said:

A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

I could continue to read similar excerpts from the President's statement, but what I have said is enough. Now, let us lay this doctrine down beside the case of Egypt and the case of Ireland. I shall not repeat the history of England's entrance into Egypt nor, indeed, the pledges Great Britain has frequently made that she proposes to get out of Egypt; that all her occupation means is a temporary occupation. I simply make the statement I have made on this floor before, that the history of the British Empire does not show a single instance where Great Britain has for any considerable period of time occupied the territory of a weak people when she has ever withdrawn.

I think I once quoted in the Senate a statement from a great speech delivered in this body touching our contest over the Northwest Territory. The orator, a Senator—and I have not been able to find the speech, but I think it was by John A. Dix—in language much more eloquent than I am able to quote in substance said this in describing the methods of British advance and the march of her empire: A shipwrecked sailor, wet and starving, is thrown upon an unknown coast and begs for a meal of victuals and for a night's lodging. The next day he requests permission to build a hut and plow a field. The next the hut has become a fortress and the furrow a trench, over which floats the flag of Great Britain forever.

That is an apt and an exact illustration of Great Britain's methods. She entered India for the purpose of trade; she holds the people by the force of arms. The horrors of the dominance of Warren Hastings have been forever recorded in a wonderful speech by a British statesman. She has extended her dominion by force of arms from year to year and from decade to decade until to-day she holds in thraldom 387,000,000 people, 92 per cent of whom, after more than a century of British rule, can neither read nor write any language of earth. Yet the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] told us the other day that Great Britain was careful of educational matters. March out a hundred of these subjects of Great Britain, born to their thraldom and wearing the chains that eat into their flesh, and only eight out of the hundred can write a word or read a line. That is none of our business if we stay out of the league, perhaps, but, if we are going in, let us go in to redeem its principles and not to repudiate them before going in. The Senator from South Dakota, I think, is called a mild reservationist by his friends and a mild nullifier by his critics, but he wants to go in. He wants to go in for what purpose? To liberate people, to help democratize the world, or to rivet the chains of despots and forge the gyves of empire? Now, when it is proposed that England shall redeem her pledges to Egypt, the Senator protests that is none of our business; and yet he is for the League of Nations because it is going to liberate small peoples and democratize the world. But he is afraid to say on a piece of paper what he will ask the boys of America to die to carry into effect.

The Senator from South Dakota is not a coward; on the other hand, he is a very brave man and a very fine gentleman and a very good Senator; but the trouble is in going forward in the interest of the League of Nations he has overlooked its obligations; and the moment he is confronted by an obligation his Americanism rises up and protests and says, "We do not want to involve America in that trouble." Surely he does not want to make an exception for Great Britain merely because she is powerful; surely he will apply the same rule to her that he would apply to any other country; and yet, although Great Britain stands pledged to Egypt by the solemn words of her statesmen—and I propose to put some of them into the RECORD, without reading, if I may have permission to do so—that Egypt will not be enslaved but liberated and given her full sovereignty, he fears to put in a reservation declaring that the United States expects Great Britain to do the very thing she is pledged to do. Why should there be any hesitation about this?

I want to call attention again to the forceful quotation which the Senator from Tennessee put into the RECORD while many of you were absent who are now present with reference to Egypt. The quotation was from Lord Curzon, who, I think, is one of the most potential forces in the British Government to-day:

But it is permissible, perhaps, to point out in a sentence, that Great Britain has gained in this war all, and, indeed, much more than all, she set out to win. Our navy remains at the end of the war intact and unassailed. The principle of freedom of the seas, which is the basis of our national existence—

That is, British freedom of the seas—

stands unimpaired and unimpugned. The British protectorate of Egypt is provided for in one of the clauses of this treaty—

Yet the Senator from South Dakota and other Senators opposing this reservation would have us believe that that protectorate is a mere form; that it is not intended to mean anything—

The British protectorate of Egypt is provided for in one of the clauses of this treaty. We are demobilizing our forces, but we can not lay down our arms; we can not disband them altogether. We must still be able to fight for what we have won, and be sure that it is not taken from us after we have won it.

What is he talking about? The only specific thing he has mentioned is Egypt; and they propose to keep it by force of arms. Mr. President, why are they going to keep it? Why does Great Britain keep anything?

Here are some additional statements of great Englishmen equally as good. In the House of Commons, Lieut. Col. Hilder said:

The outstanding feature of the peace treaty is that it puts the British Empire at the highest point that it has ever reached as regards territory and world influence. Largely by force of circumstances and the leading part which our navy and army took in either breaking down or destroying the enemy we have been left with far greater territory and power than at any other period of our race's history.

Mr. Bottomley said in the House of Commons:

May I compliment the prime minister on the great acumen he showed when he secured Britain as the mandatory of the ex-German colonies, because I believe that before we get on very far with the ex-German colonies the League of Nations will come to an untimely end, as every experiment of that kind has done. The same thing was tried in ancient Greece and failed, and what happened then will happen now. No power will enforce their verdict. It is possible that when we have spent a lot of money and had a few little wars we shall come out with the German ex-colonies to our credit. At present we owe America £1,000,000,000. Let her take over some of the obligations of Russia to ourselves. Let us see some sincerity in those high principles embodied so freely on the other side of the water.

England has a colonial policy, and she has back of that colonial policy a great scheme and general plan of government. She embarked upon world conquest something like 200 years ago, perhaps longer ago than that. She extended her dominions everywhere. Then came the Revolutionary War, when she lost the territory that now comprises the United States; but she retained Canada. Then, Mr. President, under Lord Beaconsfield, she again readopted the policy of imperialism, and it was Lord Beaconsfield who started in to acquire Egypt.

French capital and French genius had built the Suez Canal, when Beaconsfield conceived the idea of acquiring control of that canal. In the secrecy of the British cabinet it was plotted and with the celerity of lightning it was executed. The control of the majority of the stock in that canal could be acquired, and by telegram or cable England bought the control of the majority of the stock in the Suez Canal, taking it away from Egypt and placing it where it had not been, for formerly it was in the hands of an ally of France, and then Great Britain took it over. That was the beginning of British aggression in Egypt. From that day to this there has been a steady advance.

Now, we find written into this treaty a clause providing for what is nothing more nor less than the acknowledgment of the superior power of Great Britain over Egypt. That is what the language is there for, and that is what Lord Curzon says it is there for.

Listen to the President:

The heart and center of this treaty is that it sets at liberty people all over Europe and in Asia who have hitherto been enslaved by powers which were not their rightful sovereigns and masters. So long as wrongs like that exist in the world, you can not bring permanent peace to the world. I go further than that: So long as wrongs of that sort exist, you ought not to bring permanent peace to the world, because those wrongs ought to be righted and enslaved peoples ought to be free to right them. For my part, I will not take any part in composing difficulties that ought not to be composed, and a difficulty between an enslaved people and its autocratic rulers ought not to be composed. We in America have stood from the day of our birth for the emancipation of people throughout the world who were living unwillingly under Governments which were not of their own choice.

How that fits Egypt!

The thing which we have held more sacred than any other is that all just government rests upon the consent of the governed, and all over the world that principle has been disregarded—that principle has been flouted by the strong, and only the weak have suffered. The heart and center of this treaty is the principle—adopted not only in this treaty but put into effect also in the treaty with Austria, in the treaty with Hungary, in the treaty with Bulgaria, in the treay with Turkey—that every great territory in the world belongs to the people who are living on it, and that it is not the privilege of any authority anywhere—certainly not the privilege of the peace conference at Paris—to impose upon those peoples any government which they accept unwillingly, and not of their own choice.

That was uttered as late as September 19, 1919, at San Diego, Calif.; and yet, Mr. President, we now hesitate and we find opposition in the Senate to a mere expression on the part of the United States of the opinion that Great Britain will redeem her pledge and will relax her grip upon the throats of 13,000,000 people.

Why does Great Britain want Egypt? I asked that question a while ago. Let me answer it: For the same reason that she wants other territories; and why? To extend her trade and her commerce; to have an advantage in the business of the world. That is why Germany started a race with Great Britain, in order to acquire control also of dominions which she could exploit. That is why France started into the race, that she might acquire peoples she could exploit. It is exactly the same principle which inspired the Roman emperors to send their legions upon people who had never done them any harm, in order that they might bring them into subjection and collect tribute and extend trade.

Let us not now shut our eyes to a great fact which America must confront. We are about to extend American trade. It has been growing for years; but we have ceased to be a mere agricultural country, producing more than we need of grains, and sending them abroad. We have become a great manufacturing country, and if we are to prosper and grow, then we must do everything in reason to extend the area of our trade and to make our empire of foreign commerce one that is sufficient to absorb the surplus production of America. If we do not realize this to-day, we will realize it in the very near future. America's destiny in the future is dependent upon the market abroad for American goods to a very large extent. This is no trifling matter that we are discussing here to-day. It does affect us, and affects us vitally. If we permit the great bulk of the consuming world to come under the control of two or three of our commercial rivals, it is as certain as that day follows night that we will find our markets circumscribed and that our great rivals in the world will be able, if not to shut the doors of these markets in our faces, to compel us to enter at a disadvantage to us and at an advantage to them.

Until recent years the great body of the world was open for trade. It was controlled by individual Governments. Those individual Governments, by their treaties, gave to us guaranties that we would be as well favored in trade and commerce as any other nation. The "most-favored-nation" clause is written in practically every treaty we have made. Now, we find that through the events of the last quarter of a century, and especially through the events that are now transpiring, great areas of the world are being brought under the domination and control of two powers.

Why does Great Britain struggle for this control? It is not out of love for these people. It is not to educate them, for she has not educated them. It is not to Christianize them, for she has not Christianized them. It is not that she may be the bearer of beneficence and of gifts, for she has not so conducted herself. It is to gain trade advantages; and if Great Britain obtains trade advantage, then the United States must obtain trade disadvantages, for you can not advantage one nation without disadvantaging all the others, unless they have the same advantage, and that, of course, is not the purpose, and that has not been the rule.

Bearing that in mind, let me present this question to you from a very practical and selfish standpoint, possibly, and yet a standpoint that every nation must regard if it expects its people to prosper, and its course among the other nations to be successful.

Egypt is an enormous reservoir of wealth. Her production, without any English help, has always been tremendous; and a nation which produces consumes, and by the production of a nation you can measure its consumption. A nation which produces is always a market where other nations can sell, because it produces that which is most advantageous to itself, and purchases that which it can obtain at advantage. So I invite your attention just for a moment, very briefly indeed, to some figures.

A French statesman, M. Goude, in the French Chamber of Deputies, on September 4, 1919, had this to say:

The prime minister himself has vigorously defended the dignity of Egypt. He knows, as we do, that the production of Egypt supports its 16,000,000 inhabitants, including Egyptians and Soudanese; that almost all the landed property belongs to Egyptians; that its farms are cultivated by native-born subjects, to the exclusion of all others; that this country had in 1913 a foreign commerce amounting in value to 12,000,000,000 francs (about $2,400,000,000); that the national budget of Egypt is 800,000,000 francs (about $160,000,000).

This great reservoir of wealth Great Britain takes over, and intends to take over permanently; and the man is simply closing his eyes to every page of British history who expects anything else to be done.

The Senator from Arkansas read, and I want to read again, a brief extract from Rothstein's History of Egypt, which shows how Great Britain is controlling that country for the benefit of Great Britain:

Nevertheless, even under these unfavorable conditions, a cotton-spinning industry was at one time in existence in Egypt and, owing to the proximity of the raw material and the cheapness of labor, contained good promise of future development. Lord Cromer, however, out of regard for the Lancashire cotton lords, placed an excise duty of 8 per cent on all cotton products, and the industry was killed. This is the sole achievement of the British rule in the domain of manufacturing industry. The apology offered for this barbarous act is that since imported cotton goods have to pay a customs duty of 8 per cent as a revenue tax, native cotton goods would have been heavily protected without a corresponding excise duty, and this would sin against the principles of free trade.

Mr. President, that is not the first time Great Britain has pursued that policy. She has pursued it in Ireland, but of that a moment later. I call attention of Senators from the South to the fact that every well-advised man knows now that the purpose of Great Britain in taking control of Egypt is to employ Egypt as a reservoir from which to get her cotton, instead of acquiring it from the United States. She has also, as has been suggested, acquired Mesopotamia, another cotton country, and British statesmen are not taking any time "seeing visions" or "dreaming dreams." They are seizing the habitable world for the purpose of making the British nation independent of us and independent of every other country. So far have they carried this great policy—and it is a great policy from their standpoint—that to-day Great Britain's flag, as was shown by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in a remarkable speech, floats over one-quarter of the habitable earth, and under her sway are brought one-fourth of all God's creatures.

Bear in mind that she has practically assumed control of all the vast continent of Africa; bear in mind that she has extended her rule and dominion in large parts of Asia, Egypt, Mesopotamia, and these equatorial lands and will grow the cotton with which to run her mills, and she will deprive these people of the power to manufacture and compel the sending of the cotton to her mills. So it is well for gentlemen from the South to awaken to this situation.

If we sit supinely by and give our consent to the dominance of one nation over this enormous portion of the habitable earth, and then agree to guarantee it, we will find some day that her sources of wealth have been extended beyond what we can now conceive, and that our opportunity for trade and commerce will have been correspondingly decreased.

I have said, Mr. President, that the policy of closing the cotton mills of Egypt is not a new British policy, and I now come to discuss the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. He proposes, under the doctrine that the President has inaugurated and which I have just read to you, that Ireland shall be given her liberty, that that people shall be given self-determination, that the thing you have all pretended this League of Nations is for shall be carried out, and that we shall by this reservation begin to allow that nation to prepare for its functioning.

Ireland had factories once, and British penal laws closed them and impoverished the people. Ireland was forbidden to send her goods anywhere except to England, to be there manufactured. The world was deprived of Irish production. England gathered a rich harvest by closing Irish factories and denying to the Irish the opportunity to make a living. This is an old policy which England has inaugurated in Egypt. It is a policy which has been pursued in other parts of her subject domains.

The result of her treatment of the Irish can not be painted by any artist who has ever put brush to canvas, or described by any poet who has been a master of the magic of words, or by any orator who ever spoke from the tribune of humanity to a listening world. In 50 years of time half of her population died of starvation or were compelled to emigrate. Yet England kept her factories closed. The Irish people lay in windrows of dead along the highways, yet England kept her factories closed and her markets embargoed.

The Irish people, decimated by want, driven to desperation by cruelty, have from that day to this protested their right to govern themselves. They had a civilization hundreds of years before England. While the people of England were going half clad as savages Ireland had universities of learning that attracted students from all the world, and the cross of Christ was held above her churches and her temples when the citizens of England were worshiping Woden images and the gods of the earth.

She was crushed by power. She has been held in subjection by the mastery of arms. We talk about self-determination of people; we quote the language of the President, some with reverence and some almost with awe, and we declare that we are entering this league to democratize the world, and to give to people, great or small, the right of self-determination. Those of you who support this league profess to be doing so upon that doctrine and from that standpoint. Yet, sir, all Ireland is in revolt. I saw upon the screen at a picture show only night before last where the camera had recorded the methods of British rule in Ireland. Along a street thickly packed with people, jeering at their oppressors—for they dared do no more—moved troops of British soldiery, with fixed bayonets. Behind them rumbled the invincible tank, armed with deadly machine guns, ready to mow down those people for protesting the right to govern themselves.

So you find that there is no government in Great Britain but martial law, and that martial law is the logic of the bayonet; it is the argument of the bullet; it is the persuasion of the machine gun; it is the convincing power of prison cells, where rot the patriots of Ireland.

The scaffold is their appeal. Their form of government in Ireland is brute force. Against this oppression there is lifted the universal voice of a wonderful people who ought to be free.

What songs are sweeter than those that have fallen from the poetic pens of Ireland's sons? What women are fairer than Ireland's daughters? What men are braver than Irishmen? What soldiers have written in blood and in heroism the story of gallantry and manhood? What nation has produced greater orators?

What race of men in all the history of the world has stood as have stood the Irish for 700 years, protesting, and still protesting, that in the providence of God and in the course of time they will have their liberty?

Now, let us either be men or let us be something else. Let us tear the mask of hypocrisy from our faces and front this question. If we mean that there shall be self-determination for small people, if we mean that the consent of the governed is necessary to just government, if we propose we shall democratize this world by and through this League of Nations, let those who profess the doctrine vote for this amendment, and then vote for the resolution as amended.

But if you do not mean it, then acquit yourselves like men and say that you refuse to enter into an arrangement upon any false pretenses. Let us either keep out altogether, or let us say boldly, "This is a league of power, a league of force, to which we propose to add the invincible force of the United States. This is a partnership with imperialism. This is a conspiracy with kings and monarchs, to which the United States is to be committed, and in which it is to become an instrument of outrage, wrong, and oppression."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak upon this amendment, nor, indeed, upon the treaty itself.

For more than a hundred years it was a favorite pastime of orators, at least on the Fourth of July, to twist the British lion's tail. They were inclined always to boast of our great courage and ability to whip the world. Some even now indulge the pleasing thought that we conquered Germany; that we were above all others the cause for winning the war, and now that the war is over we can boast and swagger as we please and abuse the other nations which were engaged as our associates in that war.

Oh, Mr. President, we could not whip the world. We would have had great difficulty in conquering Germany alone, had it not been for the British fleet and the French soldiers. It is time men divested themselves of bullying notions. If anything has been demonstrated during this war, it has been the fact that the civilized nations of the world are dependent upon each other. The war was won and America saved because millions of Englishmen and Frenchmen died in resisting the German onslaught while the United States was getting ready to fight. It illy becomes any American to insult and abuse the nations which helped us and which we may need again.

I think a crime was committed when the opportunity was lost to get a proper working understanding between the nations after the war. I feel that such an understanding could have been had, and that we would have it now had not an egomaniac been in full control of the interests of the United States at the peace conference. But the fact is an agreement satisfactory to no patriotic American was entered into and is known as this league covenant. It contained elements of danger; it involved the United States in troubles, with no possible compensating benefits either to our country or to the peace of the world. The Senate, which is a coordinate branch of the treaty-making power of the Government, was manacled, so far as the President could manacle it, and under difficulties almost insurmountable it has been trying to save from that agreement whatever may prove beneficial. Yet this covenant was agreed to by the President and attached to the treaty of peace.

One of the greatest objections I had to it was that it involved our country in matters in which we had no business to meddle. I favored the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine for our country, and by the same token I objected to our meddling with Old World affairs. And yet now the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] proposes a reservation here that interferes with the policy of Great Britain, and to whatever extent we interfere we bind our country under the treaty. There can be no other object in introducing the reservation than to force England to do what we indirectly say by this provision that she will not do without our declaration.

Suppose that Great Britain, in ratifying this treaty, had said it was her understanding that the United States would keep her word to give independence to the Philippine Islands. I wonder how we would have taken that kind of interference? We would have regarded it as unwarranted and an insult to our country. We would have broken off diplomatic relations with England, and yet we as gratuitously insult England. The provision of the treaty in reference to Egypt, for instance, is a matter which seems to me to have grown properly, and entirely properly, out of the relations between Egypt and Germany, and I think we can well afford to trust Great Britain to do her duty under the circumstances. At least, we can afford to possess our souls in patience for a season before we insult the best and most efficient friend we have among the nations. I repeat that it is an unwarranted interference on our part even to suggest that Great Britain will not do her duty to Egypt.

As to the other matter—the Irish question—brought in here, does anybody think that it is properly involved in the treaty? Does anyone believe it speaks the truth when it says that the United States understands, and so forth? Of course not. I, of course, understand how advocacy of this vain thing may be politically popular, but I insist it is bad and dangerous politics. Senators better in these times play a less dangerous game. It may seem good politics, but every thoughtful man knows it is very poor statesmanship. It has no business here, and I will not vote for it. It will not even fool the Irish, who are always patriotic. I have objected to interfering with the affairs of the Old World and I have insisted upon putting upon this covenant reservations which I thought protected the United States as much as possible under the abnormal and embarrassed conditions which have surrounded it. The President has complicated it, and he now stands with a few of his servile followers as the sole obstacle in the way of treaty ratification. I believe that the treaty has some provisions which may form the foundation for a real workable peace covenant, and I want to preserve them. For that reason I have voted for reservations—mild where such were sufficient, and radical as the needs required. They have not injured the treaty so far as it will be a benefit to the cause of peace. They have protected the interests of the United States and left it free to continue its service to the world. But I shall oppose any attempts on the part of the Senate or on the part of any Senator to engraft reservations or amendments to the treaty which neither make for peace nor international good will but which convict us of unwarranted interference in the affairs of those nations who fought our battles, even as we belatedly fought theirs. I am seeking the means of peace, not inviting by gratuitous insult and unwarranted interference the opposition and ill will of the nations upon which we must depend in time of trouble and to whom we are under binding and lasting obligations.

I can see only one object in introducing this reservation, and that is politics. Possibly Senators think they will get some votes by voting for these propositions, and especially for the last one. They ought not to get them, but they should lose votes by this reckless trifling with our already strained foreign relations. No one sympathizes with Ireland more than I do. I hope some day, and soon, she may be free, but I insist that it is not our business under this treaty to inject this irrelevant matter into it. The treaty is already complicated enough. Possibly the amendments are offered to make the treaty more obnoxious—and God knows it is obnoxious enough already. Perhaps it is done for political reasons; but, whatever the object, I shall have no hesitancy in voting against this and all other similar amendments or reservations.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, unexpectedly this question has been brought before the Senate by the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], however, has opened the door to a discussion, because he said if this matter were brought up at another time, before the President had negotiated the treaty, he would feel differently disposed——

Mr. TOWNSEND. No, Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. And possibly discuss the question upon its merits.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, was the Senator quoting me then?

Mr. PHELAN. I am quoting the Senator not in words but so far as he conveyed the idea to me by his speech.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was very dull if I conveyed to the Senator the thought that that was our business under any circumstances. I never intimated such a thing as that it was the part of the United States to assist as a Government in establishing a free Ireland or a free Egypt or a free any other nation. I think we have business enough here at home. I would resent it the same as I would resent England's interference with our policy in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PHELAN. Of course, I could call upon the reporter for the exact words, but I desire to have it from the Senator himself. Did he not intimate that the time had passed, after the President had negotiated the treaty, when this matter should properly be considered by the Senate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had not even thought of such a proposition. I was not even considering that proposition; at least I am not conscious of having done so.

Mr. PHELAN. Of course, I will accept the Senator's interpretation of his own speech, but I am convinced that there was an intimation of that kind. When I say the door is opened wide, I will overlook what the Senator has said, but refer to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], representing the Committee on Foreign Relations, by a series of amendments has undertaken to change the form of the treaty and embrace matters that were not contemplated by those who had negotiated it.

Since the door is open, I suppose any Senator may propose any reservation, whether or not it affects Egypt or Ireland. We may regard ourselves as sitting here under our constitutional authority to give our consent and advice to the President of the United States, who is charged with the duty of initiating matters of this kind and negotiating treaties, but it has been steadfastly held, I may say, by Senators on both sides of the Chamber, that we would surrender our constitutional rights should we consider ourselves bound exclusively by what has been proposed by the President.

The President has been criticized in certain quarters for not having included the subject of Ireland in his message to Congress communicating the treaty, or in the treaty and covenant themselves. He was petitioned by a large number of citizens representing, they claim, and in fact they do represent, I believe, not less than 20,000,000 Irish or those of Irish descent in the United States. He was well inclined when he went to Paris to give weight to their words and heed to their petitions, but when he arrived there he found, as he found in many other instances, that the work which had been by the fortunes of war carved out for him related only to the countries which, by reason of the war, had been opened to the consideration of the peace conference—that is, enemy territory. The conference confined itself, therefore, to those countries which necessarily excluded Ireland, because Ireland was a part of Great Britain and was regarded with Great Britain as one of the Allies. New States and new governments were to be carved out of enemy territory only.

Mr. KING. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should propound a question?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I do not know that I understand exactly the position of the Senator, but as I interpret it, it is that we may with propriety, when we are discussing whether we shall ratify the treaty or not, append as a reservation that one of the Provinces of Great Britain or one of her possessions should have the right of self-determination and should have independence and liberty. If that view be correct, then the Senator must take the position, if I understand him, that Great Britain or France or any other signatory power to the treaty could adopt the treaty with reservations, that they ratified the treaty upon the express understanding that the United States liberated Hawaii, the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico immediately, or at the close of the war gave to them independence.

Does the Senator think that if we had a treaty before us that contained reservations by France, Great Britain, and Italy, in which it was stated that they interpreted the treaty that the United States should at the close of the war give independence to each of the Territories I have mentioned—Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands—we would even permit the treaty to be read? Would we not regard it as an insult and refuse to consider it?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desired first to make a historical statement, but I will answer the Senator. The President went to Paris with his 14 points. The Paris conference approved the 14 points, England making the single reservation, not with respect to Egypt or to Ireland, but as to the freedom of the seas. She joined with the other Allies in declaring that, with the exception of the freedom of the seas, she approved the 14 points.

What is the essence of the 14 points? On the 4th of July, 1917, at the tomb of Washington, the President declared that the essence of the 14 points could be epitomized in these words: "The reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind."

The President is very careful in his choice of words, and there was much significance in his saying "the organized opinion of mankind." He went to Paris to see that the opinion of mankind was organized; that it was not a mere sentiment; that it was not the mere expression of an ideal; but that it was something which might be reduced in the deliberations of the conference to concrete form, and that wherever nations asked for self-determination it should be competent for the conference to consider the request. His original draft of article 10 proves this.

At the conference, because Great Britain held Ireland and Egypt in subjection and contemplated the larceny of Persia, and because France had her colonial possessions, and Japan had Formosa and Korea, Great Britain and the other powers did not acquiesce in his draft and gave us something else. When it came to the question of according self-determination to the small countries as contradistinguished from the cases of Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Jugo-Slavia, the political necessities of the powers called a halt; but it can not be said that we are excluded from the consideration of these matters even now, since the Senator from Massachusetts has opened the door.

Suppose, however, the conference did say that Ireland should be given independence; that the Philippines should be given independence; that Hawaii should be given independence; and that Porto Rico should be given independence; it would always be provided those countries asked for independence. Then it would be a matter of judgment whether independence should be granted to-day or to-morrow; and if the conference had acted alike with respect to Great Britain and France and the United States, no exception could be made by this country, and the great purpose of the President would have been attained.

In addressing the plenary council January 25, 1919, President Wilson said:

> We are here to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies, not as we wish but as they wish.
> We are to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. Those foundations were the private choice of a small coterie of civil rulers and military staffs. Those foundations were aggressions of great powers upon small. Those foundations were the holding together of empires of unwilling subjects by the duress of arms.
> And nothing less than the emancipation of the world from these things will accomplish peace.

I do not believe that under the 14 points or under the doctrine enunciated by the President the United States would refuse to consider, in the face of an insistent demand from communities like the Philippines or like Hawaii, the granting of a greater measure of independence; in fact, since I have been in the Senate, within the last four years, the question has been debated whether the Philippines should not be given their independence; and it was refused, not in the face of active opposition, but only because there was no real sentiment in the Philippine Islands for independence, and because their capable statesmen did not consider their people fully prepared for self-government. A commission was recently sent here from the Philippines. While they are seeking nominal independence, they realize that every act of the United States since the acquisition of that territory has been directed to qualifying the people to govern themselves; and they now, in a large measure, do govern themselves in both houses of their legislature and in the commission which is formed by the grace of the statutes of the United States.

Cuba was actually given independence after the conquest by the United States, but I do not think that we would have felt it was an insult had we not given to Cuba her independence and had the conference under such circumstances, as I have stated, suggested to the United States and to Great Britain, Japan, and France: "Grant these people independence, because they seek independence with a burning patriotism; and, furthermore, they are qualified to govern themselves." The suggestion is on the lines of what we have already done; but what of the other powers?

Therefore, when the Senator from Tennessee introduces a resolution stating that it is the understanding of the Senate that Ireland, being qualified to govern herself, should be given self-government, there is nothing offensive, except it be an offense that we have limited our expression to Ireland, though the Senator from Oklahoma includes in a mild reservation Egypt. We might include Korea. The same principle is in-might be quite competent for this treaty, "with and by the consent of the Senate," to advise that until the people show more capacity for self-government independence should be withheld. That would not be in the interest of the selfish greed of this country or any other country, but in the interest of the people whom we seek to benefit.

The people of Hawaii are going to come to Congress and ask that their measure of independence be curtailed. Why? Because aliens have invaded that country, with the consent and knowledge of the United States, until the native and white population has been overwhelmed, and they will make that request not because they do not love the measure of independence which they enjoy, but because they see a necessity of curtailing their independence in order to preserve their native population and the white population which has gone there to establish western civilization. So each case, for these reasons, sir, must be judged by itself.

There is no question that the policy of the United States has always been to hold out an encouraging hand to nations struggling for independence. That has been a cardinal principle of the United States from its very foundation. It would not claim anything for itself in Revolutionary days which it would not be willing to accord to others. When the question of Grecian independence was brought up we supported Greece; when Kossuth set up a republic carved out of Hungary we supported Kossuth, and, notwithstanding the fact that his government was brutally crushed by Austrian tyranny, we still helped him on his way across the ocean on a warship of the United States and gave him an official reception in the House of Representatives, welcoming him to the land of the free and congratulating him upon his patriotic struggle.

Our record is perfectly clear as a nation. We are not in any sense seeking our own national self-benefit; we are not in any sense an aggressive nation. The countries to which I have referred—Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines—fell into our lap; Hawaii came in on her own motion; but, unlike other countries, the acquisition of territory has never been the purpose of the United States in going to war. Therefore we are in an excellent position in the Senate of the United States, in advising and consenting, if you please, to this treaty, to say at this time that the protectorate which England has forced upon Egypt, that land of ancient renown, shall not result in the permanent acquisition of Egypt. The Egyptians demand their independence, and it would ill become the United States, in the light of our traditional history and our established policy, to stand in the way of Egyptian independence.

I do not know how capable they are for self-government, but I know that the land is exposed in that instance to the wolf. I know the Persian lamb is exposed to the wolf; I know that the Irish lamb has been devoured by the wolf. When, by British corruption, the Irish Parliament in the last century was destroyed and it was called "the act of union," Lord Byron said, "Yes; it was the union of the wolf and its victim." That is the history of the destruction of the Irish Parliament which that gallant people set up and which subsisted for 16 years, developing great statesmen like Curran and Grattan, and restoring Irish industries and prosperity to a happy people.

England dared not to stop it at that time because she was engaged in foreign wars and the Irish were fired by the love of freedom existing in America to the establishment of which they had contributed so much; but as soon as England had withdrawn from her foreign entanglements she did not invade Ireland with her armies, as she is doing to-day, because that is bad international manners; she simply sent a horde of agents under Lord Castlereagh, and, by the use of what in that time was a great sum of money, $5,500,000, the generous bestowal of decorations and baronetcies and earldoms corrupted that parliament, which was a fairly good parliament, although elected under a restricted franchise, and in which the Catholic representatives of that Catholic country were not permitted to sit. But these great men who were developed by that parliament—Grattan and Curran and the others—had a united country behind them. The people of all faiths and all creeds and all conditions supported the Irish Parliament. It was then a united country; and since that time things have gone from bad to worse. England then and now fomented discord. England futilely made promises, and betrayed them; and at the very beginning of this war, it may be recalled, that England promised Ireland home rule, and that John Redmond, the leader of the Irish people, representing the Nationalists in Parliament, who held the balance of power, accepted the tender of home rule for Ireland, and urged the people to enlist in the war, and 160,000 Irishmen, under the exhortations of their own leader, John Redmond, entered the lists of the British Army, to fight for what? Greater power for Great Britain?

The enslavement of peoples overseas in India, and in Egypt, and in Persia? The broadening of the British Empire? The glory and the greatness of "perfidious Albion"? Not at all. They entered the war because they believed that as a result of it, pursuant to an official promise, they would enjoy a measure of home rule, and even that was perfidiously denied them. The best English statesmen, like Asquith, declared that England's conduct was unpardonable, just as in another generation Gladstone had declared that the crimes of England against Ireland had no parallel in the history of Christendom. Then the Irish people rebelled at Easter of 1916, and they gave their lives for what they believed to be their national interests and rights, and they have persistently and without compromise since that time demanded, not a measure of home rule, but their independence.

Why should a people capable of self-government, demonstrated throughout the world, be subjected to English domination, which has been expressed in all the years with so much brutality? Their own man, John Ruskin, said that "The Irish are a witty and an affectionate people, and can not be ruled by the witless and the heartless." There is such a wide margin of difference between these people that Ireland will never accept government from England. She might from the United States, because there is an entente which can not be destroyed between the land of the free and Ireland, struggling for freedom; but she will not accept from England, now, any paltry measure of home rule.

She demands her independence; and I have thought, and have voted with my convictions, that under the League of Nations England, no longer fearsome of aggression from the outside by which Ireland might be used as a base of supplies and operations, would give Ireland her independence if she had an assurance of that kind, and that was the strongest argument that could be made for article 10—that England would not consider herself exposed if the united powers would prevent aggression against her or her overseas possessions. On the other hand, the Irish, under their leaders, take the ground that if the powers committed themselves to prevent aggression under article 10 against Great Britain it would be impossible to get the material assistance of any other country in order to effectuate Irish independence. But England is quite capable, by reason of her superior strength, of holding Ireland in subjection, and it is really immaterial whether she is backed up by the other Allies or not, and hence it was not so much a matter of concern for Ireland as Ireland believed; but Ireland did not desire to see the world and the League of Nations committed to a proposition by which she would be cut off forever, as she thought, from external aid.

Ireland is capable of self-government, and she has already self-determined her self-government. She has made her case in the tribunal of the world; and what has been the answer of England? At a time when self-determination is supposed to be the dominant idea of the League of Nations, in a campaign led by the United States for the freedom of the peoples of the world, many of them enjoying it either now or in immediate prospect—as Poland and Czechoslovakia and Jugo-Slavia, for instance—what is the position of Ireland? That the soldiery of England, seventy or eighty thousand, and a constabulary of 12,000, is holding Ireland in the grip of war when we are told there is no war.

It is rather a melancholy prospect for a league of peace to find that while we are debating it one of the most worthy countries in the world, which has contributed so much to American greatness and prosperity in peace and war, is held in martial rule, and held in martial rule because the people, inspired by the principles of the United States, have risen in rebellion against a heartless and oppressive Government. That is their only fault.

I had the pleasure within the last few weeks of meeting Sir Horace Plunkett. He is a great Irishman, but not a politician. He never took part in Irish political affairs except when he was called to preside at a convention of all Ireland to determine the question of Irish government; and when he proposed that Ireland should have fiscal control over her affairs, which is the very essence of sovereignty, the Government rejected the plan.

Now, he comes forward with some other propositions with which I am not familiar; but he told me that the home-rule bill, proposed but a short time ago, within the last two weeks, by Lloyd-George, the premier of Great Britain, should be laughed out of court; and in a public speech he has since stated that it was absolutely without merit, and that is the empty shell which Great Britain is now presenting to Ireland and which she scornfully rejects. I believe he has a proposal to give Ireland her independent government very much as we have given Cuba her independent government, and that there will be a dim protectorate over it, nothing that warranted interference from day to day but only in the event that there was disorder or civil war that there would be intervention. I do not know that that is acceptable to the Irish, but I believe that is the idea of Sir Horace Plunkett. On the other hand, the leader of the Irish, de Valera, stands for independence; but he, according to the press of New York, listened to the Plunkett proposal and hence there is some division in the ranks of those who are leading Ireland on her way to greater freedom. That, however, is a difference between friends; but the Lloyd-George proposal never shall be accepted with the consent of the Irish leaders. Therefore at this moment the fate of Ireland is in the balance, and if the Senate of the United States, pursuant to the traditional policy of this Government, should express sympathy with the struggle of the Irish people for freedom then and in that event Ireland might possibly be able to win from reluctant Britain a concession which would substantially amount to independence, and, winning such a concession, it would be the stepping-stone to full and complete sovereignty some day, sooner or later, just as Cuba has earned it by her exemplary conduct during the last 10 years, showing a real capacity to take care of her own affairs, and she necessarily has a very friendly regard for the United States. She does not resent the operation of the Platt amendment. On the contrary, she regards it as an additional protection; and if England had treated Ireland with the same frankness and accorded her the same independence I am sure that Ireland would have looked upon England in a very different light, and the English fleet would not only be there to protect England but to protect Ireland against external aggression, and England would be the natural market for the enormous production of Ireland, which goes far to feed the British people.

The thing is easy of solution. We are not doing violence to Great Britain when we propose it. The greatest minds in Great Britain to-day, as well as in Ireland, believe that it would be better for both countries if Ireland were free; but there is no question that Ireland will some day be free, for, rely upon it, the lovers of freedom will be free, and no one can question the love of the Irish for freedom. It is not a holiday parade. She has given martyrs in every generation, and she nas had to show her passports throughout the world at every crossroads. She has not been abashed by temporary defeat. She has gone right ahead steadfastly and has never been turned from her purpose; and—

> There never yet was human power
> Which could evade, if unforgiven,
> The patient search and vigil long
> Of him who treasures up a wrong.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk and ask to have read an amendment to the amendment now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the original proposition offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] by inserting after the words "Great Britain" the words "and Japan respectively"; also, after the word "Ireland," insert the words "and the ancient Kingdom of Korea"; also strike out the word "it" where it occurs in the same line and insert in lieu thereof the word "they"; also strike out the words "a member," following the word "become," and insert in lieu thereof the word "members"; so that the amendment as thus amended will read as follows:

> The United States further understands that, in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination and equality of all nations pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations, that Great Britain and Japan, respectively, will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the republic of Ireland and the ancient kingdom of Korea and agree that they become members of the League of Nations, with equal representation accorded to all other sovereign and independent Governments.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am as fond of the Irish, I think, as other men in public life. I am fond of them not just as we are entering the campaign or for election purposes, but for their many splendid qualities. But, Mr. President, I think it is about time to quit our demagoguing about Great Britain.

I am sorry this reservation is here. I do not hesitate one moment to vote against it or to denounce it. It is an insult to a friendly nation. It states:

> The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination and equality of all nations pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations that Great Britain will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the republic of Ireland and agrees that it become a member of the League of Nations, with equal representation accorded to all other sovereign and independent Governments.

We do not understand any such thing. We do not understand that Britain understands any such thing, and it is an insult to the British nation for the United States Senate to pass any such kind of a reservation. It is not the truth.

Let us quit fussing with Britain. These two nations will have to stand together for the civilization of the world. It is true that the history of the British Government in Ireland is a history of wrong. But that has gone by, and the British Government, I believe, is to-day desirous of doing the right and the square thing by Ireland. I hope Ireland may soon become an independent republic.

I wonder what we would think if some one were traveling through the British Empire raising funds for a free and independent Philippines, or a free and independent Porto Rico, or a free and independent Virgin Islands. We would better cast the beam out of our own eye before we try to pluck the mote out of the eye of Britain.

Mr. President, I had an opportunity to see the great British fleet in the war. It was the first line of defense; and as I saw that magnificent fleet of some fifteen hundred fighting vessels I knew that there was the first defense of the American Republic; and when I think of that I grow tired of the constant haranguing of Britain on the floors of Congress.

We had an exhibition of Britain when that old Scotchman, Haig, stood, at a time when the world was trembling, and said, "Our backs are to the wall; Britons, stand and die," and Britain was ready to stand and die for the civilization of the world.

Let us quit fussing about such a nation; let us quit insulting Britain on the floor of the Senate day by day.

You can go back a little ways in history to Manila Bay, and at the time Dewey sailed into that bay the German plans were nearly perfected to go out and conquer the world. When he there commenced to destroy the Spanish fleet the Germans commenced to get in his way, and it was Britain that said to Germany then, "Stand away. We stand with the American Republic." That stopped German desires to start something.

Let us permit Britain to manage her own affairs.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator might go a step further and assert with perfect truth that the British fleet has nearly always been the mainstay of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. KENYON. That is true.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not yield, because I am nearly through, and I want to finish.

In making these remarks I have not intended to say anything unkind of the Irish people. I do not care about any Irish votes that are secured at the expense of maligning a great nation like Britain, and I raise my voice in protest against the continual insulting of the British nation on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had in view to make some remarks along the line of those made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], but I would not have presented the subject nearly so well as he has.

I will supplement what he has said, so far as the first portion of the reservation is concerned. It declares that—

> The United States further understands that in the fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination and equality of Governments pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations Great Britain—

And so forth.

Mr. President, there is nothing of that sort in the covenant. There are no such provisions in the covenant. There is nothing in the covenant that provides self-determination for any people or gives it to any subject race.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not just now. I wish to proceed a little further with the thought I am presenting.

We have here the original plan of a covenant presented by the President and offered in evidence before the Committee on Foreign Relations. I hold in my hand his original article 10, then article 3. It contained provisions for the relief of subject peoples, all of which were stricken out by the Paris conference before the covenant came to us. Let me read to you the President's idealistic views upon the subject, none of which was accepted by the other four countries in Paris. I read you the original article 10, then article 3:

> The contracting powers unite in guaranteeing to each other political independence and territorial integrity, but it is understood between them that such territorial readjustments, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations or present social and political relationships, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may, in the judgment of three-fourths of the delegates be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the peoples concerned, may be effected if agreeable to those peoples, and that territorial changes may in equity involve material compensation. The contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.

That was in the original article 10. But all of the humanitarian portion, all of the idealistic plan of the President by which the league was to bring to the peoples of the world the privileges of self-determination, the great vision he had of freeing the subject peoples of the world when they were capable of self-government and desired it from the domination of power was stricken out before the covenant was completed.

It was, indeed, idealistic. It was, indeed, a lofty purpose of human service. But who could have expected Japan to have agreed to it, who could have expected England or France to have agreed to it but so lofty an idealist as the President himself? Point me to a word left in article 10 carrying these thoughts. They are all gone.

Furthermore, let me call your attention to the address of the President before the plenary council. I take this language from a telegraphic report:

To the plenary council, January 25, 1919—

This is part of the President's speech—

We are here to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies, not as we wish but as they wish.

We are to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. Those foundations were the private choice of a small coterie of civil rulers and military staffs. Those foundations were aggressions of great powers upon small. Those foundations were the holding together of empires of unwilling subjects by the duress of force.

And nothing less than the emancipation of the world from these things will accomplish peace.

The President therefore urged that an agreement to use force by members of the league would not accomplish peace. Not an agreement to preserve the territorial boundaries and the political governments of the members would preserve peace, but nothing less than the right of self-determination, freedom to all the subject peoples in the world, would give peace or permanent peace. Freedom to Korea, freedom to India, freedom to Egypt, and freedom to Ireland. That was the President's plan as the only way, for he declared "Nothing less than the emancipation of the world would accomplish peace." I agree with him, and I have no faith, therefore, in the power of force contained in the first of article 10 to preserve peace for the world. But what I wished to do was to point out that I could not truthfully vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, because I do not find in the covenant anything to justify the claim that this covenant obligates the members of the league to recognize the great principle of self-determination and equality.

The President made it a part of article 10, but the Paris conference cut it all out.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does not the Senator find in the treaty, made in pursuance of the covenant, provisions for plebiscites to allow the Danish Provinces, Danzig, and other countries to determine their future government? Does he not find that the Saar Basin is put under the control of the League of Nations? There is nothing in the covenant about the League of Nations assuming trusteeship for other countries or other nations, but power is given to the council to act upon all matters—in the substance—within its jurisdiction or sphere. They have provided in the treaty, evidently under this general power, that the League of Nations shall hold the Saar Basin in trust for 15 years, and then determine by plebiscite or otherwise whether it shall be turned back to Germany or retained by France or be an independent nation. Here is found the principle of self-determination.

Are not those provisions for self-determination?

I have not said there is any express provision for self-determination in the covenant. I said that was the underlying principle of it, and I got that from the President's construction of it. That is the language of my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The treaty provided for the freedom of certain Provinces that had belonged to Germany, but contained nothing of the kind with reference to other subject peoples. The league covenant omits the provisions contained in the original article 10. It applies simply to Provinces taken from Germany in the German treaty, and I do not find the right of self-determination carried quite as far as the view expressed by the Senator in the proposed amendment, even when Provinces were freed as a result of the war. Shantung was given to Japan, England has taken Mesopotamia, and France Syria.

I repeat, there is nothing in the covenant to justify the claim that the members of the league agreed to give to countries subject to members of the league the right of self-determination, and I can not understand how anyone ever expected that such an agreement would be made.

What I wanted to do was to call attention to the fact that in the original article 3, now article 10, as furnished to the Committee on Foreign Relations, there was such a provision, and the President based his advocacy of article 10—the forceful end of it—upon the further provision giving the right of self-determination to subject peoples, but every line of this portion of the article was stricken, and nothing is left to allow me to say truthfully that I understand that the fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination is carried into this covenant at all. That which was to make the world safe for democracy has not been left in the covenant. I know it is out. The Governments signing the covenant have agreed to nothing of the kind.

I am not in favor of undertaking to interfere in the domestic relations of other countries. I am unwilling for them to interfere with ours. As I voted against any provision in the covenant that allowed any member of the council to touch our domestic problems or to determine which are domestic and which are not, so I will not vote to interfere with the domestic problems of other countries.

For me to support a reservation which declares that I understand the covenant gives any relief to subject peoples is impossible, because I do not so understand the covenant.

My heart has gone out, since I was a boy, to the Irish in their struggles, but I do not understand they will find relief in any provision of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has given his construction of the covenant and treaty, and he has also read the construction given by the President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was not his construction. That was his declaration on the 29th of January as to what the covenant ought to be, not what it was.

Mr. SHIELDS. That does not change what I intended to say. The President, of course, went to Paris to carry out his views, and it has been asserted again and again upon the floor of the Senate that he did; that he absolutely dominated the peace conference and wrote his views into the covenant and into the treaty. It is asserted that it is the President's treaty that he brought back here and presented to the United States Senate and insisted that we should ratify it without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t."

The Senator from Georgia has given his view of what is in the covenant and treaty, and the President of the United States has told us what it means. The Senator from Georgia sat here in the Senate with other Senators and was not even allowed to hear anything about what was going on in Paris; we were all absolutely ignorant of it. The President was there and assisted in writing it. Now, who knows what is in it or what it means?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. After the written instrument was brought here, does the Senator from Tennessee think it so poorly expressed that it is impossible for us to find out what it means?

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Georgia has substantially repeated what the President of the United States said in his great tour through the West expounding this treaty. Nobody can get up here and deny that the President of the United States was there pleading for government by consent of the governed and for the self-determination of peoples. That was the spirit which should have pervaded the whole thing and that is the principle which should be found in it from end to end. That is what the President went to Paris for; and how are you going to say he did not accomplish it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why did they strike out the provision that the President had on that subject, which I read a little while ago and which has been stricken out?

Mr. SHIELDS. Because, as the President construed it, that is mere surplusage. The great principle is there, according to his exposition of it. I am not going to controvert the President's view of it. I was not there; I did not help to write it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. REED. On July 10, 1919, the President said:

The treaty, as a result, is not exactly what we would have written. It is probably not what any one of the national delegations would have written. But results were worked out which on the whole bear test. I think that it will be found that the compromises which were accepted as inevitable nowhere cut to the heart of any principle. The work of the conference squares, as a whole, with the principles agreed upon as the basis of the peace as well as with the practical possibilities of the international situations which had to be faced and dealt with as facts.

Mr. SHIELDS. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. REED. Mr. President Wilson's speech placed in the RECORD on July 10, 1919.

Mr. SHIELDS. After the treaty had been presented to the Senate?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. The treaty was presented, I believe, June 28.

Mr. President, all I have to say is that if Senators wish to approve the crimes that have been committed against Ireland, to ridicule the wrongs that people have suffered during the last 800 years, I am not responsible for their action. If a Senator wants to compare the great Irish people, who have done so much for civilization and the enlightenment of the world, to the negroes of the Virgin Islands, it is for him to do it. The glorious history of Ireland and her people needs no defense in this Chamber. It is known and admired of all the world. It speaks for itself.

I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will not prevail. This is a serious proposition. If we are to make any reservations in favor of any people, as I stated in my opening remarks, the Irish are entitled to our consideration as much as the Egyptians. I do not think that Japan has anything to do with this matter. I do not think the Koreans have the same claims upon America as the Irish. I demand that my amendment be treated with the seriousness that the rights and aspirations of the great Irish nation entitle it to, and I shall insist that it be given that consideration in this Chamber.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I proposed this amendment upon the conviction that if there was any ground at all for the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the same reason existed for the inclusion of Korea, which has received the same treatment, contrary to its own wishes and in opposition to treaty regulations, which forms the foundation of the Senator's amendment.

I fully agree with every word uttered upon the floor by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] regarding this subject. I am not introducing the amendment for the purpose of casting any aspersion or ridicule upon the Irish people. We know no difference between peoples when the principle of justice is invoked. It has been invoked here by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] in the original reservation, and in behalf of a dark-skinned people whose wrongs have appealed very strongly to the Senator's sense of justice, but whose wrongs are, nevertheless, in my judgment, inferior to those of the Koreans.

The reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma affecting one people has justified the Senator from Tennessee in offering an amendment to it affecting another people, and I am quite as consistent, and, I think, more just than the Senator from Tennessee in my effort, if this reservation is adopted at all, in proposing to include other people who are equally entitled to the consideration of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may we have the pending amendment reported?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. A request is made that the Thomas amendment may be read.

Mr. OWEN. I join in the request that the Thomas amendment may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the original proposition offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] by inserting after the words "Great Britain" the words "and Japan, respectively"; also after the word "Ireland" to insert the words "and the ancient Kingdom of Korea"; also to strike out the word "it" where it occurs in the same line and insert in lieu thereof the word "they"; also to strike out the words "a member," following the word "become," and insert in lieu thereof the word "members," so that the reservation as thus amended would read as follows:

> The United States further understands that, in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination and equality of all nations pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations, Great Britain and Japan, respectively, will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the republic of Ireland and the ancient Kingdom of Korea, and agree that they become members of the League of Nations with equal representation accorded to all other sovereign and independent governments.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the reservation which I have proposed states that "the United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war." Such a reservation is justified by the language of the treaty itself, for the treaty directly provides for the recognition of the British protectorate over Egypt by Germany, and we have a right to express our understanding; indeed, it is our duty to express our understanding, because at the time when the protectorate was declared representations were made to the United States with regard to its significance, and if we fail to express our opinion with regard to it, then we are precluded hereafter from objecting if that protectorate be converted to other purposes; at all events, we fail to discharge our duty now and to limit our liability under the treaty by expressing what we have a right to express and a duty to express—a reasonable reservation with regard to our understanding of it. When, however, we come to the proposed amendment, dealing with an entirely different subject, there is no justification whatever for saying that the United States understands that in the fulfillment, execution, and so forth, the Republic of Ireland must be recognized by Great Britain. What right have we to say that from anything in the covenant or anything in the treaty? Is it really true?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, the Senator from Oklahoma agrees with the Senator from Georgia that the principle of self-determination and the equality of governments are not recognized by this covenant and treaty?

Mr. OWEN. I shall not be diverted into any side issues; but I say there is nothing in the covenant and there is nothing in the treaty which justifies the statement of fact. The United States does not understand anything about it from anything there is in the league covenant or in the treaty of peace. The United States, of course, has a right under the letter of November 5, 1918, which I so abundantly emphasized on the floor of the Senate, to recognize the great principles that ought to animate those who believe in government by the consent of the governed.

Mr. SHIELDS. The United States will have such an understanding if the treaty-making power, the President and the United States Senate, so declare.

Mr. OWEN. The United States Senate has no right to say in this way that "the United States further understands." What is there in the treaty and what is there in the covenant of the league to justify the statement as a matter of fact? Is it the truth? I pause for a reply from the Senator. [A pause.] I will not subscribe to anything I do not believe to be true, not even to get the Irish vote. I do not think we ought to deal with this matter with levity. The reservation in regard to Egypt was justified, because we are in terms committed under section 6, article 147, of the treaty. We are requiring Germany to recognize this protectorate, and if at the same time we fail to express what the protectorate means, we leave the interpretation put upon it by the British foreign office that it is a matter of permanence.

Mr. President, I make a great distinction between the British people and the British foreign office. The British foreign office has in it men who are trained by a life of diplomatic instruction; men who are nearly all of an imperialistic and Tory tendency. The British people are liberal, and I do not sympathize in any respect with the saying of anything on this floor that would reflect upon the English people or wound their feelings. I desire that the relationship between the United States and the people of Great Britain should be one of amity and friendship. I greatly regret that this amendment should be offered. I can not feel that it was intended to clarify—it certainly has not the effect of clarifying—the reservation, but it has the effect of confusing it. I hope the amendment will be rejected by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask that the entire amendment, from alpha to omega, may be read, in order that we may know what it is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the reservation as it would be if all of the amendments which have been proposed to it were adopted.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, in order that it may appear fully, I wish to perfect the amendment which I originally offered. After the word "self-determination," in the second line, I desire to insert the words "of peoples." Also, where it now reads "equality of all nations," I desire to strike out the word "nations" and to insert "governments." I ask that the amendment be modified in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], together with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Mr. SHIELDS proposes to add, at the end of the reservation offered by Mr. OWEN, the following words:

> The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination of peoples and equality of all Governments pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations Great Britain will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the republic of Ireland and agree that it become a member of the League of Nations with equal representation accorded to all other sovereign and independent Governments.

Mr. THOMAS proposes to amend those words in four particulars so that, if amended, it will read:

The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination of peoples and equality of all Governments pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations Great Britain and Japan, respectively, will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the republic of Ireland and the ancient kingdom of Korea, and agree that they become members of the League of Nations with equal representation accorded to all other sovereign and independent Governments.

So that the reservation, if amended, will read:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination of peoples and equality of all Governments pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations Great Britain and Japan, respectively, will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the republic of Ireland and the ancient kingdom of Korea, and agree that they become members of the League of Nations with equal representation accorded to all other sovereign and independent Governments.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator wish to interrupt me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield for a question.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Tennessee in submitting the amendment just proposed has in view, I believe, the danger of referring to the equality of nations, because it might affect the consideration of our domestic questions by the League of Nations. Am I correct?

Mr. BORAH. I should like, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho has yielded for a question to be propounded to him and not to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. There will be no discussion on my part.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. SHIELDS. I had in mind what is in the covenant and the treaty and the underlying principle and spirit that pervade them.

Mr. PHELAN. Then I understand the Senator is not in any way trying to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California for a statement or for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield for a statement in reply to the Senator from Tennessee, and then I hope I may be able to proceed.

Mr. PHELAN. I think it is very important to know exactly what the Senator means. I assume, with his consent, that he changed the phraseology by inserting "Governments" for "nations," in order not to embarrass the reservation with an acknowledgment of "the equality of nations," a principle which was rejected at Paris.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; as all other righteous principles were rejected at Paris.

Mr. President, I rise to say that if the League of Nations had been constructed upon the principles announced by the President before he went to Paris there would be no objection whatever in this Chamber to any one of the propositions now included in this reservation. If you will study the principles announced by the President and which apparently had the support of this country prior to the time they were taken possession of by the diplomats of Europe, you will find that they are in perfect harmony with everything expressed in this reservation. The reason why the Senate can not adopt this proposition is that it is out of touch with the covenant itself; the principle of self-determination and the rights of small nations have been absolutely eliminated from the covenant, and to put them in the covenant is to construct an incongruity. That is the reason why, after having discussed this treaty for 14 months upon the basis upon which the diplomats of Europe built it, we hesitate to come back to the principles upon which the President attempted to build it. How strange, indeed, would any principle of justice, of liberty, of the rights of small nations seem in this gigantic autocracy, built upon sheer power and dependent for its existence upon sheer force. You had just as well look among the handiwork of the Kaisers and Czars for the principles of self-determination as to look for them in this structure, designed and built for the purpose of holding in subjection for all time the countless millions who have now been brought under the rule and sway of four or five great powers.

Who can object to anything that is in this reservation upon the ground of principle? The reason why objection is made to it is because the covenant is constructed upon the theory that 300,000,000 dominant people are to control 900,000,000 subject people; and if it is not maintained upon that theory, it falls to the ground.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the statement made by the President before going abroad—which, by the way, I regard as more or less academic and as a statement of a general doctrine—committed the nations of the world and those who accepted that general academic statement to the policy of immediately liberating colonies, dependencies, and dominions, cutting all the bonds that united them to the parent Governments, and setting them up as independent nations? Does the Senator think that that statement meant that the United States was to liberate the Hawaiian Islands, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, and that Great Britain and all other nations that might accept that pronouncement of the President's were afterwards to let Ireland go and Egypt go and Korea go and Morocco go, and other dependencies and territories, controlled by the various nations of the world? I do not understand that that broad statement or generalization of the President required that we or any nation that joined the league or that did not join the league should go out in a Don Quixote style for the purpose of liberating every nation and every people and giving them a government of their own.

Mr. BORAH. When the President announced his principles to the Congress from time to time there was no more active eulogist in the Senate Chamber than the Senator from Utah. They were not academic propositions at that time. They have only become academic propositions since they were transformed into this autocracy, dominated by the five great powers of the world, over 900,000,000 subject peoples. Then they became "academic," and this became the "practical" proposition which is before us.

What is the situation with reference to those principles? The President was very careful, when Germany signified her desire for peace, to transmit to the allied powers a specific statement that peace could only be had upon the basis of his speech upon the 8th of January and the addresses thereafter made upon that subject. The whole world was familiar with that speech and those addresses. They had been discussed in every clime and in every land. There was no place where language was spoken that people had not met together and discussed these new policies. The Allies understood them, and Mr. Lloyd-George and other prominent men of Europe and of England had discussed them, and had time and time again accepted them in public speech; and when the President sent that message to the Allies, the Allies went carefully over those addresses from the 8th of January until the 27th of September, and made but two exceptions in regard to them. They did not intimate that they were academic and impracticable, or that they would not be bound by them. They said, "You eliminate the freedom of the seas and give us an opportunity to construe the question of reparation and we will make peace with Germany upon the principles announced by the President"—not only in his 8th of January speech, which included the 14 points, but in all the speeches which followed, at Mount Vernon and New York, up to the 27th of September. They accepted them, and the President replied upon the basis of their acceptance, and the armistice was had upon the basis announced by the President and accepted by the Allies.

What I say is, Mr. President, as was so well said by Prof. Keynes in his book, that not a single one of those principles was written into this covenant. On the other hand, the five great powers met there and took not only the subject peoples that they already had but they incorporated in their dominions and under their control millions who prior to that time had not been under their domination. There never sat in the history of the world such an imperialistic body as that which convened at Versailles. That is a general statement, but upon that general statement I submit the facts of history.

I want to read—and I trust I shall not be considered disrespectful to the English statesmen when I do so—how one of the great powers got through with the President's policy. This is an article in a recent number of the Saturday Evening Post:

I sat in the House of Commons and heard Lloyd-George declare that the Paris treaty had increased by 800,000 square miles of territory the responsibilities of the British Empire. If one adds to that other countries and territories which in one way or another have come under the British control during and since the war and sums up the total, the result is amazing.

I shall not in the press of time give the entire list. It gives the countries here and gives their area, and the territory of subject peoples who have been brought under the control and domination of Great Britain as a result of the war, and it amounts to 3,805,000 square miles and from about 35,000,000 to 40,000,000 people. That is larger, sir, than all the States west of the Mississippi River. That is larger than the Louisiana Purchase; larger than the Louisiana Purchase and the original thirteen Colonies.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is larger than the entire area of the United States, including Alaska.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so; but I have not the exact figures for comparison.

Mr. THOMAS. It is certainly larger than the United States, exclusive of Alaska.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. It is too large; it does not make any difference how large it is or how small it is. It was taken in violation of every announced principle upon which the war was fought.

Now, Mr. President, I want to invite your attention to the fact that as to this three million and some hundred thousand square miles, inhabited by thirty-five to forty millions of people, this covenant of the League of Nations provides no method or manner by which they may be heard for their freedom. There is no provision, no machinery, through and by means of which they can ever in a peaceful and lawful way secure their independence, their liberty—no tribunal before which they can, as a matter of right, upon their own initiative, plead their cause. They can only be heard through their masters and adjudged by their masters. Forced under sway and domination, as in the case of Egypt, against their wishes and over broken pledges, they are there beneath the brutal feet of power, and this cruel league is built to hold them there forever.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would the Senator construe these possessions that he has just been describing as coming within the territorial integrity that is referred to in the covenant of the League of Nations, which we are asked to guarantee?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So far from according an opportunity for the people of these territories to be heard, it condemns them, on the contrary, to everlasting servitude.

Mr. BORAH. There is no way in the world by which the 900,000,000 of subject people can ever secure their freedom through the covenant of the League of Nations. They may fight their way through as they will, but when they come to fight their way through, if we go into it, Uncle Sam will stand there with his moral support, if not his military power, to see that they remain in subjection, if he lives up to the league.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to suggest, if the Senator will pardon me, that notwithstanding the reservation that has been adopted which provides that we shall not assume that obligation unless Congress shall act, if this league is ratified with that article in the covenant, then the pressure of the league and its combined influence and the international forces back of it will be exerted upon Congress to require it to act in accordance with that article.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if some friend of the league, mild, drastic, or unconditional, wants to test the principle upon which this league is built, let him offer a reservation here to the effect that the principle of self-determination is recognized at all times, and that when one-third of the people of any territory signify their desire for independence and freedom the council of the League of Nations shall provide a manner by which they shall record their votes, and if a majority is in favor of it they shall have their freedom. Write it into this league if any man dares to; put the principles which were announced by your leader and accepted by the great mass of the people throughout the world into this league and it will tumble overnight. Put the principles upon which it was promised to be built in the form of a reservation, and have it adopted by the Senate, and neither Japan nor France nor England would accept it for a single moment. Write in here what we promised the world and then the hideous deformity of the present league will be plain to all. This is an autocracy. There is no democracy in the league. The voice of the people is excluded. The league is not a league of peoples, but a league of diplomats and imperialists.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I remind the Senator that on various occasions I offered a reservation recognizing as a contract the letter of November, 1918, which preceded the armistice, and upon which the great nations agreed as a condition by which the German people were induced to lay down their arms. I think there ought to be a reservation recognizing that contract and that agreement, and I should support it. I do not recall, however, that the Senator supported it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is very much mistaken. I am sure if he will look up the RECORD he will find he is mistaken. And if he will offer it now the Senator from Idaho will support it. Mr. President, if you can build a League of Nations upon the principles announced by the President in his several speeches, including all the principles, it would command the support of many who now oppose it, and the opposition of many who now support it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As I understand the position of the Senator from Oklahoma he is very much opposed, as is shown by his reservation in regard to Egypt, to the provision of the peace treaty in regard to Egypt.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator's reservation shows no opposition. This reservation is merely an interpretation of what is meant by the representations made to us at the time the treaty was entered into.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the Senator showed, by offering the reservation, that he believes an interpretation is necessary, and consequently that he is not satisfied with the peace treaty as it stands at present, in so far as it affects Egypt.

Mr. OWEN. In order clearly to limit our liability.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; and yet, as I understand, notwithstanding all that the Senator has said about Egypt and all that he has said about the injustice that will be done to Egypt by the adoption of this peace treaty without his reservation, he expects to support it and has lent his influence here in behalf of it.

Mr. OWEN. Undoubtedly, I shall support the ratification of the peace treaty. I desire the world to have its peace, and the people of the United States to have their peace. I accept the greater advantage of the treaty rather than defeat the treaty and sacrifice the larger for the smaller. I will not vote against the peace treaty merely because I do not approve some of the reservations. I will not vote to leave the war measures still in force.

Mr. BORAH. How is the world going to have its peace? By force; by repression; by dominancy. Now, I want peace. I have always been an advocate, in my humble way, of peace; but there is something which, to my mind, is infinitely greater and more vital than peace, and that is liberty and justice to all people. I would have the utmost contempt for a people who would not place those things ahead of peace. Yes; we will have peace. We will have peace in Egypt, because the dominancy of the English Government will make peace.

We will have peace in India, because they will do as they did a few months ago, when those men arose and asked for the principle of self-determination. They will shoot them down—men, women, and children—and kill as many at one time in India as Germany killed altogether in Belgium, outside of the actual battles fought.

We will have peace, undoubtedly, in Syria, where France is in control, because France is now using her power for the purpose of repressing those people.

Undoubtedly, if the military power of these five great nations holds out, and is strong enough, and the people in the several countries do not rebel against the power, we will have peace, because the military power will make peace. They will do it as the Turk leader once said that he would settle the Armenian question, by leaving no Armenians with whom to deal.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to suggest that we would have had peace—the entire world, in all likelihood, would have had peace, both actual peace and legal peace—more than a year ago, if it had not been for the avowed purpose of the President of the United States to delay peace until, by that delay, he was able to coerce the Senate of the United States into the adoption of the covenant of the League of Nations.

The delay of peace is due to the purpose of the President, carried out by his acts, of so weaving into the peace treaty the covenant of the League of Nations that you could not get peace without the adoption of the covenant of the League of Nations. So he delayed peace from the world for more than a year.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was speaking of that peace which is to come after the treaty is either ratified or rejected—that is to say, it is by reason of the combination of the five great powers and their military capacity to continue a state of peace.

I have spoken of the increased power of England and the subject peoples over whom she has extended her sway. Now, let us look for a moment at the situation with reference to France; and here let me say, Mr. President, that it is not my business, and certainly not my keen desire, to discuss either the affairs of Great Britain or of France or of Japan upon the Senate floor. If we are permitted to go our way, as we have gone for 150 years, during which time we have been building up our dominancy in civilization, and attend to our own business, the discussion of the English statesmen and the other great men of the world and of other peoples will cease on the floor of the Senate. I have been in the Senate for 12 years, and until the time when this proposition was submitted to us I have never heard any discussion upon the floor of the Senate which could be considered unfriendly to any nation.

In my judgment, when we are relieved from the task which is now imposed upon us, of adding our influence, both moral and material, to holding in subjection countless millions of people, we will cease to discuss their affairs. We will hold ourselves, as the distinguished leader of the party said in New York a few weeks ago, ready to throw our great influence upon the side of justice and upon the side of liberty whenever a particular crisis arises; but we will cease the discussion of other people's business here and turn to our own business. But when and so long as the American people are asked to enter into a covenant which imposes upon them the obligation of holding in subjection millions of people, it is not only the right and the privilege but it is the solemn duty of Senators to call the attention of the people to the facts as they exist. I will respect other peoples; I want the friendship of other peoples; but when I see a hideous scheme to oppress millions, I shall speak in such language that it will be easily understood. I would rather offend than through a false courtesy connive at a great wrong.

England, as I have said, has added these vast possessions to her power. France is now seeking to add possession to her power and bring people under her dominion in Syria. What right has she there? Perhaps a right which satisfies her, but she has no right in Syria which any American principle can recognize. She is there to-night fighting and men are dying because the Syrians want their independence. She is holding them in subjection by force of arms. And that becomes my business, especially in so far as she asks the United States to join in the enterprise. Then it is our business, and men may speak plainly. When wrongs are being perpetrated and weak peoples oppressed I shall not be misled into silence for fear some overwrought and sensitive soul may think I am offensive toward the oppressing nation.

What is the condition of the Koreans and of other subject people covered by this reservation? They are under the domination of Japan. When those Koreans took their way to Versailles they presented the most pathetic petition that it has ever been my misfortune to read to those men gathered there for the purpose of initiating a new era and establishing a new civilization. The moment it was presented Japan, sitting as a member of the council, signified her desire, and they were refused even a hearing. They went back, and those 20,000,000 people are now under the iron heel of Japan. We are asked to join a covenant and a league which will throw our moral influence, if not our military power, on the side of the oppressor and against the oppressed.

Therefore, Mr. President, these are not things where we can be charged with interfering with other peoples' concerns. If the Senators think it is improper to discuss these things here, let them vote with some of us to end this proposition and debate upon these questions will cease. But do not mislead yourself for a moment. The debate upon these questions will not cease in the United States Senate, it will not cease before the people of the United States, so long as this Government is a copartner in the enterprise of holding them in subjection. Just so long as that task is imposed upon us it will be a living and a burning issue in the United States.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I would prefer to see these reservations separated, while I would prefer to see this Egyptian amendment adopted and the others offered separately, I shall support any proposition which has even a color of the principle of self-determination or which seems to offer the smallest assistance to any people who are seeking freedom and striving for their God-given rights.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the presentation of these motions for reservations in favor of the aspirations of subject peoples before the ratification of the covenant of the League of Nations suggests an inquiry into the reason why these questions are now before us. An opportunity is now offered to consider the general question of how, if at all, the claims and rights of the subject races of the world were considered at the peace conference, and what steps, if any, were taken to promote the peace of the world by preventing the necessity of war between nations and races to relieve injustices, persecutions, and oppression. Such a discussion will enable us to better understand that as long as the League of Nations as set up in this treaty functions similar motions and similar efforts by the friends of subject peoples will be made again and again for the purpose of getting the United States Senate to express its approval of the rights of people struggling for self-government, and also for the purpose of having the American Government advise its representative in the league on these questions.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has given expression to the thought that these reservations suggest to my mind, namely, that after many months of agitation and discussion of this question in the United States Senate our people have come to the conclusion that there is absolutely no machinery set up in the League of Nations to adjudicate the claims of subject peoples seeking independence. Indeed, we now know more than this; we know that such provisions were deliberately eliminated. This lamentable fact is now established beyond controversy.

Any attempt to establish world peace which fails to recognize certain fundamental principles inherent and inalienable to subject peoples and the denial of which has so frequently been the cause of war can not be considered an honest effort to establish permanent peace in the world, and such an attempt is doomed to certain failure. It is rank hypocrisy to seek the establishment of world peace through a league of the nations of the world without clearly stating and definitely providing for the elimination of every violation among nations and races of the fundamental conceptions of justice; without removing the opportunity to wrong the weak and rob the unfortunate; without providing the means of attaining the legitimate and natural aspirations of every people; without ample provision for the termination of the oppression of one nation or race by another; without the recognition of the fact that the one evil among nations which invariably leads to war in one form or another is the continuation of a state of selfdom and the oppression of one race by another.

To insure peace by the surrender of the principles of honest dealing and common justice between nations large and small and races enlightened and backward is a hopeless task. If crimes of oppression are to continue in the world let us at least prevent them from being justified in the name of peace and protected by a League of Nations.

How important it is in any movement for world peace to provide the methods for hearing and adjudicating by the application of the principles of justice and of liberty, without the necessity of resorting to war, the rights of the peoples and small nations capable of self-government to set up governments of their own choice, may best be appreciated by reference to a few statistics. There are 900,000,000 of subject peoples dominated by the five great powers of the world. These 900,000,000 of subject peoples are controlled, dominated, and governed by 300,000,000 people. Do we believe or do we intend that all these peoples are forever to remain stupid and ignorant of their inalienable rights?

Not only did the great powers of Europe through their representatives at the peace conference refuse to hear the delegations that went to Versailles for the purpose of having the principles embodied in the "14 points" of President Wilson and accepted by the Allies applied to their causes, but indeed they took steps to provide a further and stronger hold upon the subject peoples they already dominated. They also actually added to their control millions who had not been up to that time under their subjection, and they brought under their control and domination additional millions of square miles of the earth's territory. One nation alone, Great Britain, increased its possessions by adding to its territory an area larger than the whole of the United States. It would appear that this peace conference, which we had every reason to believe was to represent a new order in international diplomacy, reiterated the doctrine that the participation in the settlement of national disputes involves the privilege if not the right to slice off for one's own benefit and purposes a portion of the territory of distressed or weaker nations.

I now challenge—for surely after all this debate we have reached some definite conclusion—any Senator upon this floor to point out any section or article of the league covenant which gives any opportunity for subject peoples to obtain a hearing and have their claims for independence determined. I wait for an answer. [Pause.]

Again I challenge any Senator to show me any provision in this league covenant which gives an oppressed people any practical assurance of justice, even if a hearing is granted, in the strange and improbable event that the oppressing nation should consent to a hearing concerning charges against itself. [Pause.]

Mr. President, we are dealing here with a movement for world peace. Let us see how peace is to be secured when subject people assert their right to independence. There are two methods by which such people can obtain independence. First, by war. But that is old-fashioned. We are to have no more wars. The dawn of eternal peace has come. Subject peoples must never again mention the word "war." But where are the principles of international justice and the impartial tribunals representing the great nations of the earth that are to remove all causes of war? The second method is by peaceful agitation, by organization, by plebiscites, by elections, and by the majority giving notice to the world and to their supergovernments that independence is desired.

If wars are to end, if we are to have no more bloodshed, in God's name why have not the subject peoples of the world been given an opportunity through the league to express their desires and present their reasons for self-government? Mr. President, what have we actually done by the terms of this covenant? The league has closed the door upon them and, most lamentable of all, the world peace promoters at Versailles have by their actions said to these enslaved peoples seeking their political emancipation, "The only way hereafter that you can get your liberty and independence is by war"—and yet one of the chief objects for which the American soldiers so gallantly fought was to end wars. Let us see what is the exact situation in which subject peoples are left by this covenant.

There is, first of all, no provision whatever in the league covenant permitting any subject race to ever petition or of its own volition ask for or obtain a hearing. Mark that. There is no way by which a subject race can ever enter the office of the council or assembly of this league and file in its own name a petition for redress.

The only way, therefore, the case of a subject people can be introduced is by obtaining some member of the league to present its case, if, indeed, it is possible even then to get a hearing. In what will this result? It will result in just what is taking place in the Senate this afternoon. It means that petitions and memorials and resolutions will be filed here asking the United States to take the initiative in espousing the causes of subject peoples by presenting their cases to the council or assembly of the league, as long as the league exists. It means that there will be brought into this Chamber for discussion and for judgment the case of every subject people. It means that the friends of Egypt and the friends of Korea and the friends of Ireland and the friends of the Chinese in Shantung and the friends of the Lithuanians and the friends of the Moroccans and the friends of other subject races will at every session of the United States Senate plead with us to instruct or request our representatives in the league council to champion their cause and seek, if possible, to obtain a hearing for them.

Suppose the United States has taken up the cause of a subject people and its representatives have asked the league council, rather than permit another war between a subject people and their supergovernment, to hear their case. What is the next step? In the first place, for the council to take jurisdiction of the case, unanimous consent is required. Imagine the United States asking the council to take up, for example, the case of Egypt. What do you think Great Britain would say? "I object," and her objection, under the rule requiring unanimous consent, ends the question, and it is removed from deliberation.

Suppose that Great Britain or any other country does not object. Let us see what is the next step. A hearing is held and the question is debated, and the time comes for a vote and the passing of judgment upon the issue by the members of the council. Unanimous consent again is required, and the one interested nation or any friend of that nation can raise its objection and end as far as assistance through the league is concerned the hopes of the aggrieved people for aid or a favorable decision.

But unanimous consent will not even give them a hearing, for the covenant specifically eliminates domestic questions from its jurisdiction, and the league intentionally and deliberately excluded thereby the cases of subject peoples.

Mr. President, the absence of machinery in the covenant to take care of these cases is a rejection of every international principle and ideal for which America has stood in the 140 years of her existence, for she has been the friend, the sympathizer, and the supporter of every subject race of people worthy of self-government seeking to obtain a government of its own choice and of its own kind. It is a betrayal of our protestations solemnly made during the war.

Why are the friends of Egypt, Ireland, and Korea here? Why have they been seeking through all these recent months for America's recognition of their right to self-determination? It is because America, through the inspiring words of her Chief Executive, stirred to hope—yes, stirred to action—every subject race and its sympathizers throughout the world.

We now know, we now understand, after this long discussion, just what was in the minds of the men who originated and framed the language of this covenant. We know that the President of the United States sought to establish a method of hearing these claims. I am not one of those who condemn him because he failed. I am not, however, going to accept without a protest his failure to secure this fundamental necessity to promote peace. But what I do object to is that any public official or any other American should say that the machinery for the purpose is in this league when as a matter of absolute frankness it is not.

The original article 10 which President Wilson presented to the conference at Paris, and which was rejected, contained the principle which would advance and assist in settling and adjudicating the cases of subject people seeking independence.

Article 11, it is true, would appear at first glance to provide for a hearing. It provides that a member of the league may bring to the attention of the council—

> Any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb the peace of the world.

But may not this mean that when subject peoples seek to stir up sympathy or obtain assistance in another quarter of the world the league may act? Under article 15 all domestic questions are eliminated from consideration by the league and, of course, all questions relating to the attitude of the supergovernment toward a subject people are domestic questions. The league, therefore, may act when subject people seek outside aid, but the cause itself of the subject people is not justiciable, because it is a domestic question.

I desire to emphasize what we now know happened at that peace conference in the consideration of the principle of self-determination and in making it possible for subject peoples to obtain their freedom without going to war.

A partial survey of the world was taken to carry out this principle, but it was confined solely to the territory of the Central Powers. The attitude of our allies was this: These principles and these doctrines relating to the rights of small nations are good to apply to our enemies, but we do not purpose to apply them to ourselves.

We are asked to approve of a covenant which has applied this principle in part to the enemies of the Allies, and which, instead of leaving the door open for future settlement of the issue between subject peoples and their supergovernments, has actually, and, I believe, deliberately, set up article 10 as a barrier by asking us to sanction and approve existing political arrangements and guarantee existing territorial integrity. Without an honest and complete resurvey of all the world, the attempt to establish a status quo is undemocratic and amounts to nothing short of an imperialistic alliance.

Let me ask any Senator if he is certain that, after the league is adopted, if the friends of Egypt appear in this country to start a movement to arouse this country to sympathize with or assist the Egyptians in getting their independence—is he sure that under article 11 it would not be considered a movement which may result in threatening the peace of the world, and that the council may not take jurisdiction and instruct the United States of America—because what in Egypt is a domestic question has become in America an international question likely to affect the peace of the world—that it must exile the agitators and suppress the agitation in America for the independence of Egypt?

I should like to know if, under article 11, it is not possible for the council to ask the suppression of any newspaper that is hereafter published in America which asks for money or for support or for help for a subject people who are striving for their liberty or their independence? I should like to know if, under article 11, the council could not take jurisdiction of the presence in this country of representatives of the Egyptians or the Irish or the Korean peoples raising funds and arousing their friends here to indignation against their treatment by the supergovernment, and whether, under article 11, the council can not instruct the United States of America that the movement may result in war or disturb the friendly relationship between members of the league and therefore should be discontinued?

One of the worst features of the covenant is that under articles 10 and 11 we may be compelled to close our doors to these subject peoples; we may be asked to abandon our sympathy for them. After the delegates at the peace conference resurveyed the part of the world which their enemies occupied, they proceeded to close the door and to ask us, the United States of America, to join with them in preserving and protecting against external aggression not only the new boundaries set up in the treaty but all the previously existing boundaries and the political relations of nations, no matter how unjustly these boundaries were obtained or how tyrannical the supergovernment.

Talk about compromising on article 10! There can be no compromise. The obligation stated there is direct and specific. Will we accept it? Are we ready and willing to preserve the territorial integrity and present political arrangements of other nations against exterior aggression? I, for one, do not propose to support any reservation that does not clearly and plainly relieve us from this obligation. I am unwilling to have the United States, through article 10, execute a perpetual mortgage upon the resources and lives of our people. Article 10 makes this league a status quo league. Article 10 undertakes to maintain the present conditions of the world, with all its injustices to little nations, by force of arms. Article 10 sounds the death knell for little nations now in bondage so far as the league has potence. Article 10 makes the United States a partner of the nations of the world engaged in the oppression of weaker peoples. Article 10 unites us directly and commits us unequivocally to the work of holding down by force subject people everywhere who are trying to obtain liberty. The moment subject races appear in America or in any other country and ask for aid and support that moment it is likely to be claimed that external aggression has begun and that the obligation of article 10 becomes effective.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Massachusetts, of course, recalls the provision attached to article 10 in the President's original draft which required the recognition of subject peoples and the right of self-determination? Was not the heart cut out of article 10 when the conference eliminated that provision of the President's proposal leaving nothing but the iron and the steel?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly. I have already said that the draft of article 10 which was presented by President Wilson left the door open, provided the machinery, and set up the principle for the settlement of disputes between subject peoples and their supergovernments. The draft which was presented by the President, as I pointed out in my speech of last October, contained language to the effect that "the peace of the world is superior in importance to any question whatever of political jurisdiction or boundary." This was a part of the language which provided for the application of the principle of self-determination. This was one of the phrases that would have prevented a status quo. Why was that language stricken out? It was omitted because the imperialistic powers—Great Britain, France, Japan, and Italy—refused to subscribe to this principle.

Mr. President, I have already said more than I intended, and I have not commented upon the pending reservation or any of the others proposed. In view of our public declarations, in view of the fact that this league, without article 10 eliminated, ends forever the hope of subject races for freedom, there will be motions like those now pending in this Chamber continually made asking this Government to intercede. These questions will be in every election; there will be the Irish issue, the Egyptian issue, the Shantung and the Korean issues. We shall meet them at every turn, because here is the tribunal—not the League of Nations—where the first step must be taken, if, indeed, any effective step can be taken, to present the case of subject peoples to the League of Nations.

Mr. President, I repeat, this league covenant closes the door and denies hearings to subject peoples in such an unmistakable way that this issue and the claims of every subject race will be constantly before the American people to pass upon their merits or demerits. I regret that the reservation before us is presented in such a way that there is not a clear opportunity to go on record for the principle underlying it. If I know anything about America and the spirit of the American people, the Nation is in sympathy with the aspirations of every people capable of self-government seeking to set up governments of their own selection. As I understand the spirit of America, it wishes every people to have the same opportunity and to get the same support and help that the founders of this Republic received in 1776, when they sought their independence.

The sentiment of America is in favor of the aspirations of the Irish, the Egyptians, of every people who are capable of governing themselves. America especially has reason to be interested in the one English-speaking race in the world held in subjection—the one English-speaking race in the world asking for liberty—the Irish race. Of course, the American people sympathize with the aspirations of this race and of every other race in a like situation, and I believe this Senate does also, regardless of what may be its action upon the pending amendment, which involves a question of expediency and procedure as well as one of principle. I am certain that the Senate believes in the principle.

Mr. President, one of the greatest lessons of history is that which shows how many wars have resulted from the efforts of various races of men to rid themselves of the domination of their affairs, political, commercial, and religious, by another people. We now see how this lesson of history was forgotten at Versailles. The failure of the peace conference to correct this evil and make future provision to remove as much as possible the jealousies and contentions existing between different races caused by the attempt of men of one race to govern other races against their will has brought bitter disappointment to the thoughtful people everywhere who entertained the hope that the peace conference would take at least preliminary steps to solve this problem.

How could the drafters of this covenant expect to further their great object of world peace without establishing the foundations of permanent peace by making ample provision for securing and maintaining complete political freedom throughout the world?

Mr. President, is not history a story of progress and advancement of the races of men? God Almighty has never yet produced a generation of men who could represent the perfection of progress and advancement. The assumption that we have reached the pinnacle of civilization and that there are to be no more evolutions of governments or changes in the political or intellectual status of races is absurd. The absence of methods in the league covenant to bring these changes about in an orderly manner, or in any way other than by war, is certain to make this league a failure. We do not know history if we think that even those among these millions who are now ignorant and illiterate are always to remain indifferent or subservient.

This is the most melancholy situation resulting from the war; the most heartless and unjust, and therefore the most certain to react with terrible consequences hereafter. A league that will perpetuate wrong and will not insure justice is tyrannous and unnatural. The spirit of the age is against it. The provisions by which it proposes to curb the aspirations of subject races for liberty are unenforcible. Unless they are abandoned the league itself must soon perish, and the world will be fortunate indeed if its end does not come in a world conflict as bloody and disastrous as that which led to its beginning.

Mr. REED. I present two reservations, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table to be called up hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. I send to the desk a proposed reservation to the pending treaty, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

As in legislative session,

H. R. 8062. An act to extend the permit privilege to include first-class mail was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

H. R. 11769. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

H. R. 12537. An act to provide for an examination and report on the condition and possible irrigation development of the Imperial Valley in California was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

H. R. 12954. An act providing for the relief of populations in Europe and in countries contiguous thereto suffering for want of food was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand that the House bill providing relief of populations in Europe, and so forth, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair observed that it was so noted upon the bill, and referred it accordingly. The Chair is not sure, however, as to the proper reference.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply say that in the other House the bill was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, but if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires that it shall go to the Foreign Relations Committee, I have no objection.

Mr. LODGE. The bill was reported in the other House by the Committee on Ways and Means, but I can assure the Senator from Utah that I am only too glad to have the Committee on Finance take jurisdiction of it in the Senate. The Foreign Relations Committee has no desire to have anything referred to it which is not necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the reference will be changed, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

SHIPMENTS OF COAL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there is an important question which at the present time should engage the attention of the Senate, and that is the question of the diversion of coal by the authorities here in Washington. Certain legislation has been prepared by the subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee to correct the present conditions. I intend to introduce to-morrow certain bills with reference to the matter, and I should like to have the opportunity to make a brief statement when those bills are presented. Otherwise, I will make the statement to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Will it be equally agreeable to the Senator from New Jersey to make the statement in the morning?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall be very glad to postpone the statement until to-morrow. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, who has risen to move a recess.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Jersey yields to me for the purpose of making the motion which I rose to make, he, of course, retaining the floor to-morrow morning. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 17, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH).

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, impress upon our minds the fact that creeds, though founded upon supposed truth, are but stepping-stones toward the higher, nobler life; that dogmas are at best but guesses. The Master taught emphatically the immortality of the soul, but he taught little, if anything, about the nature of the life beyond the grave. The emphasis of his precepts was laid upon the life that now is. We are to live to-day that we may be the better prepared for the morrow; this year, that we may be the better prepared for the coming year. Think right, live right, keep to the right, trust in God, and fear no evil. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, which he has asked me to do. It is with reference to a matter that we discussed the other day in connection with the foreign trade.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Secretary of Commerce relative to the foreign trade. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that the matter in connection with the bill that the Committee on the Judiciary is considering?

Mr. DYER. It is. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the Secretary of Commerce says he was in some respects misquoted as to the letter that he had written. I desire that his letter may go in in order that the mistake may be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 11, 1920.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: My attention has been called to your speech on page 4285 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1920, in favor of adopting H. R. 7204. You insert in the RECORD my memorandum of January 27, 1920, but, unfortunately, you omit the heading of this memorandum, which states distinctly that it does not refer to H. R. 7204, but refers specifically to H. R. 5704. The memorandum as incorporated in the hearings on H. R. 7204, page 23, is complete with the title, "Incorporations of Certain Companies Engaged in Foreign Trade—H. R. 5704."

The extension of your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would appear to defeat the very purpose of the testimony which was offered by this department, namely, to make clear that the department is behind H. R. 5704, which provides that 51 per cent of the capital stock of these companies should be held by American citizens, and that it is not in favor of H. R. 7204, which provides that 51 per cent of the voting stock only should be held by American citizens.

It would be appreciated if you would give this correction the same publicity which you have given the original error.

Very truly, yours,

J. W. ALEXANDER,
Secretary of Commerce.

RESIGNATIONS OF OFFICERS IN THE NAVY AND ARMY.

Mr. OLNEY rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. OLNEY. To ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLNEY. In part of my time I will ask the Clerk to read the following headlines from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read as indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy is facing ruin—Failure of House to act on pay bill causes disintegration—Resignations by wholesale—Only two or three men aboard some of the best destroyers—Commanding officers declare that they are afraid to fire a gun, not knowing what may happen to gear or to raw crews. Economy policy of lower body criticized by the Senate. (By Robert T. Small.)

Mr. OLNEY. I would respectfully bring to the attention of the steering committee the demoralized state of the Army and Navy on account of the fact that neither House has taken any action upon the proposed Wadsworth-Crago pay bill. As I understand now, the Committee on Naval Affairs has taken up the proposition of increases in pay for enlisted men and officers of the Navy, Army, Marine Corps, and Health Service. I understand that in conference it has adopted the Wadsworth bill. I would respectfully urge the steering committee, including the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and others, that speedy action be taken in the near future so that private industry will not from time to time reach out and take from the Army and Navy our best officers, who are resigning daily on account of insufficient salaries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, is it in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY]?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a regrettable fact that great newspapers sometimes lend their columns to the most exaggerated statements, to misleading statements of the facts in regard to public matters. The article in the Washington Post this morning, the headlines of which have been quoted, is not written, I regret to say, with full and accurate knowledge of the facts, and that it is exaggerated in its statements and its tone is indicated by the headlines which have just been read.

The Navy is not disintegrating; it is not facing ruin; it is not going to pieces. All is not lost but honor, notwithstanding this article in the Post. There have not even been resignations by the wholesale, though we have often been told there would be.

Now the situation is this: The House was of the opinion—the House committee and House Members generally who took an interest in the matter—that there was a situation in the Navy that demanded an increase of pay of the warrant and petty officers, of the noncommissioned officers of the Navy. That necessity largely grew out of the fact that those men are highly trained men—mechanics, electricians, and machinists—who can at this time secure employment at high rates of pay in the industries. It seemed, from the testimony of the responsible officials of the Navy, to be necessary to increase the pay of those men in order to keep things going properly in the Navy.

There are many in the House, and I think some in the Senate, who do not believe that just at this time we can increase the pay of all of the officers of the Army and Navy and the Coast Guard and the Public Health Service. Increases of that kind, carried to their logical conclusion, affecting not only the military branches but the civil branches, involve expenditures of possibly several hundred million dollars per annum. It is a pretty serious question just at this time. We all realize that if the pay of the officers of the Army and Navy was not excessive before the war, it is possibly not adequate at this time, or not as much as these gentlemen ought to get. But the country is full of people who are not now receiving pay, compensation, or income much, if any, in excess of what they received before the war, or at least not in proportion to the increase in the cost of living.

I think that it can be conservatively and truthfully said that two-thirds of the American people are not receiving compensation in excess of that they received before the war in proportion to the increased cost of living. Many are receiving no more than they did before the war. None of the civil employees of the Government whose salaries are above $2,500 have had any increase. A very great many of our people have found it necessary to economize. It would be a very good thing if more would do so. The officers of the Army and Navy, of the Regular Establishment, many of them—most of them, in fact—received more pay during the war than they received before the war because of their increased rank and additional allowances and because of their overseas pay. They have certainly had no real ground of complaint on that score until possibly recently when with demotion their pay may have been decreased.

I think that it is not unreasonable to suggest that the officers of the Army and Navy, secure in their positions, are about the only people under the American flag that know that they will never suffer want whatever happens. I do not think it is unreasonable to suggest to them that they wait a bit, that they be somewhat patient, that they economize also with the great majority of their fellow countrymen until we know where we stand in the matter of revenue, what the state of the Treasury is, and how the national balance sheet is to stand.

Now, those who may be somewhat responsible for the fact there have not been increases in pay all along the line have not only been willing but anxious that the pay of the warrant and the petty officers of the Navy be increased.

The only reason why their pay has not been increased is that the commissioned officers of the Army and Navy, many of them receiving pay running high into the thousands, seem to be insisting that the pay of these petty officers shall not be increased unless their pay is increased; at least that is the attitude of those who plead their cause. It is the attitude of these men—at least of those who urge on their behalf—that makes it difficult to increase the pay of the petty and warrant officers of the Navy. If there could be an understanding that the pay of these petty and warrant officers, the men who are essential to the running of the ships, could be increased without increases all along the line, running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, the matter could be easily settled. But when gentlemen insist that the pay of men as high in rank as colonels, brigadier generals, and admirals shall be increased before or at the same time the pay of the petty officers is increased, so long as gentlemen insist on that, there is some difficulty in having the matter adjusted.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. CRAGO. I know the gentleman does not want to make a misstatement along that line. There is no bill which I know of that provides for the increase of the pay of an admiral or a brigadier general.

Mr. MONDELL. It is true that some of the first bills introduced provided for increased pay for officers of as high rank as admiral and colonel. I think even brigadier general. It is true that the bills were finally amended so that they did not apply to the higher ranks, but the demands were just as insistent on the part of generals and admirals as it is on the part of the officers of lower rank.

Mr. CRAGO. Let me say to the gentleman that that is not my experience. The generals and admirals have said "we are not asking for any increase for ourselves; we are willing to get along, but we do ask for an increase of pay for the lower officers and the noncommissioned officers."

Mr. MONDELL. If these gentlemen and their friends will let it be known that they are willing to have the pay of the skilled mechanics, the noncommissioned officers, the workers in the Navy increased whether their pay is increased at the same time or not, the thing can, I think, be accomplished in a very short time.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be placed in the attitude of criticizing the officers of the Army and Navy for desiring more pay or calling attention to the fact that when they are demoted and returned to their prewar status their pay will be no greater than it was before the war.

These gentlemen have a perfect right to do that, and, furthermore, I sympathize with anyone who is having a hard time to get along, who is having to economize. Some of us do not have to listen to the experience of others in order to realize embarrassments of that kind. I do think, however, that one can say without being unfair and without exaggerating that there has been a rather extraordinary, almost unseemly, insistence on the part of some.

Most of the officers of the Regular Establishment of the Army, by reason of their increased rank, overseas pay, extra allowance for quarters, received compensation during the war considerably, and in many cases very largely, in excess of their prewar compensation. Many of these officers have retained this temporary rank and pay until very recently; some are still receiving it. To a lesser extent, perhaps, that has been the condition in the Navy. I suppose people easily acquire the habit of living up to their increased income and no doubt it is difficult to readjust one's self to a former standard.

I do not know just how many men and women there are employed in the civilian branches of the Government who receive more than $2,500, which I believe is about the average second lieutenant's pay and allowances, but I do know that none of these people have received a penny of compensation more than they received before the war. I do not think we can well increase the pay of men in the military branches of the Government receiving as high as $5,000 or $6,000 a year, besides their allowances, without doing something for those in the civilian branches, and I do not pretend to say that there are not strong arguments for doing something for all of them. My contention is that until we know whether we are going to be able to effect very considerable economies, whether or no we are going to be able to keep the expenditures of the Government within the revenues this year, we can not increase salaries and compensation, except where it is absolutely essential in order to keep the Government's business going.

There has been a great deal said about resignations from the Army and Navy. There are always an unusual number of separations from a military establishment at the close of a war of any considerable magnitude, followed by favorable industrial conditions. First, because the war experience in itself inclines some men to leave the service. Second, and more important, in time of industrial expansion and development after a war there is always a demand for men who have proven themselves men of special capacity and ability, and particularly men of experience in handling big jobs and in handling men in large numbers. Large industries have been seeking new men and very naturally they have gone into the military services and have offered compensation to picked men largely in excess of the ordinary compensation of a man in the Military Establishment.

The probability is, however, that there has been a very great deal of exaggeration in this matter of separations from the service. We are now considering the Army reorganization bill, and during its consideration in committee and since there has been much pressure in favor of so framing the measure as to make it possible to retain in the service a very great proportion of the officers now in the service. The same situation exists as regards the Navy. There has been very great insistence that we shall have a commissioned personnel in the Navy large enough to take care of practically all of the officers now in the service. I am not insisting that this number is too large. Some may note the coincidence that the number proposed is approximately sufficient to take care of the present personnel.

From present appearances it will be impossible to keep the appropriations for the Army, Navy, and the Marine Corps below $800,000,000. It is true that that is only about half of the total estimates for these services as presented in the Book of Estimates, but it is eight-tenths of the total sum required to operate all branches of the Government immediately prior to the Great War. We can not now promise that it will be possible to keep appropriations for these purposes as low as $800,000,000, but if we do it will not include anything for increased pay for the commissioned personnel.

If the increases that have been insisted upon are granted, they would increase the total nearly $100,000,000. In connection with this insistence for a higher pay we have heard one time and another suggestions that if the pay were increased we might reduce the numbers, but I do not notice any disposition to do this. On the contrary, in the departments and in the services, there is an insistence, as I have already stated, for a commissioned personnel large enough to supply a place for about all of the men now holding commissions in the services.

May I again suggest that there would be no difficulty whatever in promptly providing some increase in pay for the petty and warrant officers of the Navy if gentlemen are willing to have that done without insisting upon readjusting the pay of the commissioned officers at this time. If the arguments in favor of the increase of the pay of the officers are as sound and conclusive as they are claimed to be, they will lose nothing of their force by delaying consideration of the matter until we can have an opportunity to survey the whole field, to judge of the probability of some reduction in living costs, and to become informed as to the future conditions and prospects of the National Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have heard so many times in the House that it was impossible to keep mechanics in the Navy, because they could get so much higher pay outside, that I was a little surprised when recently a case came under my notice of a young man who enlisted in the Navy from my district for the purpose of being a mechanic. He was placed on board one of the ships now in the Pacific. He was given the work of an ordinary deckhand. When he asked why he was not permitted to do a mechanic's work he was told that they had too many mechancs and had no use for him as a mechanic at all, whereupon, I am sorry to say, he deserted.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not been altogether persuaded that it was necessary to increase the pay of the petty officers, but the Secretary of the Navy insisted on it, and the pressure has been so great that I have been rather of the opinion that possibly it was necessary to be done.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not expressing any opinion about that, but in view of the fact that I had heard so often that they could not keep mechanics in the Navy on account of the pay that I wondered why they had so many that they could not put this man to work.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I know of a case where a man went into the Army because he wanted to give the Army the benefit of his experience as an electrical engineer. They put him to work washing dishes and did not give him anything else to do. How can they expect to have a man of merit, a man of experience and knowledge, if they do not utilize that experience and knowledge when they get the man?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 495.

Resolved, That the Committee on Education is hereby authorized to investigate the Federal Board for Vocational Education, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to sit during sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman from Ohio want to do this thing for?

Mr. FESS. The New York Evening Post printed six articles, written by a Mr. Littledale, charging the Federal Board of Vocational Education with lax administration and several other things. The board have made a request that the charges be investigated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who made the request?

Mr. FESS. A member of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. The Committee on Education took up the matter and decided that an investigation ought to be made by the authority of the House. This man Littledale was brought before the committee and submitted 26 charges, some of them rather serious, others not important, and he has submitted a list of names that he asks the committee to summon. We can not order that unless we have the authority to issue subpœnas and to administer oaths. I think it is really due to the service that the investigation be made.

Mr. SNELL. You want sufficient time to go into this matter carefully and consider it?

Mr. FESS. Yes; to give it consideration, so that we may know whether there is any foundation for the charges or not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman know whether this Mr. Littledale is a citizen of the United States or a visiting brother?

Mr. FESS. The testimony would indicate that he is a visiting brother.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He is a citizen of Great Britain, is he not?

Mr. BRAND. This man was born in India and went from there to England. He has been over here about 14 years and has never become an American citizen by due course of law. He is still a British subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. The gentleman is an old, seasoned statesman.

Mr. CALDWELL. Seasoned, but not old.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. Does the gentleman think there ought to be an investigation entered into every time some fellow somewhere, foreigner or native citizen, suggests something wrong with something?

Mr. FESS. I do not, but if I were a member of the board I would want it investigated, and the board has written a letter to the Committee on Education requesting the investigation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, the statement of the gentleman from Ohio does not indicate that he thinks many of the objections at all serious.

Mr. FESS I think a good many of them are not serious.

Mr. GARD. Before obtaining the authority of Congress to direct this investigation, would it not be proper to compel this man Littledale at least to make out a prima facie case by the submission of affidavits, and by his own proofs or other proofs? It seems to me that ought to be done before going into the extraordinary business of investigation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Littledale was before the committee for two and a half hours. His testimony was taken. The committee feel that in justice to the board and the service we ought to call these witnesses that he has demanded that we summon.

Mr. GARD. He was there voluntarily, was he not?

Mr. FESS. Yes; upon my request. I made a request of the New York Evening Post to send this man down here to appear before the committee.

Mr. GARD. Do the witnesses whom he names refuse to come without a congressional summons?

Mr. FESS. We have not made that attempt. We wanted to do this thoroughly if we did it at all, and wanted to be able to bring witnesses here in case they declined to come.

Mr. GARD. I believe there are now something like 70 investigations going on in different branches of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESS. I think this is the only case where the parties to be investigated are asking for the investigation.

Mr. MADDEN. They ought to be permitted to be investigated if they want to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this Britisher make oath to his statements?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. CALDWELL. Did he submit any documentary evidence in support of his charges?

Mr. FESS. Yes; but we could not administer oaths without authority of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming demands the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. If I can not get information on this subject I will have to object; but I was trying in my feeble way to get it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman was not asking for information on the subject.

Mr. CALDWELL. I was asking for information on the subject, and I resent the challenge of my veracity by the gentleman from Wyoming. I do not know any reason why he should make any such statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. I object.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army reorganization bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, can I be taken off my feet?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the point of no quorum present is in order at any time. The gentleman from New York makes a point of order that there is no quorum present. Undoubtedly no quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California moves a call of the House.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL) there were—ayes 47, noes 2.

Accordingly a call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, the Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CALDWELL rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, in the House a short time ago I rose and made this statement:

If I can not get information on this subject, I will have to object; but I was trying in my feeble way to get it.

Whereupon the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said:

The gentleman was not asking for information on the subject.

He thus impugned my motives. I hand up the transcript of the proceedings to the Chair and ask for a ruling of the Chair upon a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to the effect that the gentleman was not asking for information on the subject, in the view of the Chair, is not an intentional misrepresentation of the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], and the impression of the Chair is that there is nothing in that statement impugning the gentleman's motives, but the Chair would gladly hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will read the statement by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], wherein the gentleman from New York questioned the courtesy of the gentleman from Wyoming, and the failure of the gentleman from Wyoming to retract any statement or disclaim any idea of reflecting upon the gentleman from New York, the Chair will see the motive that was in the mind of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman directs the attention of the Chair to what immediately follows?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The language of which is:

Mr. CALDWELL. I was asking for information on the subject, and I resent the challenge of my veracity by the gentleman from Wyoming. I do not know any reason why he should make any such statement.

That is immediately followed by the Speaker asking—

Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] stood on the statement that he had made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of personal privilege in any case. If the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] had impugned the motives or the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], it would not have been a question of personal privilege. It would have been a case where the gentleman from New York might have asked that the words of the gentleman from Wyoming be taken down. Not having done that, it is a past incident. I am inclined to think that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is in error in thinking that he was asking for information about the resolution pending before the House, and I do not say that with a view of impugning the gentleman's motives or his statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state, after reading the entire transaction, that it is the view of the Chair that nothing occurred which impugned the motives of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], nor does the Chair think that there is sufficient in the colloquy upon which to base a question of personal privilege.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army reorganization bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday last the committee was dividing on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. A point of no quorum was made, and the committee rose. The vote now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas be again reported for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 34, line 14, after the words "class A," strike out the balance of the line and all of line 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "In any case in which an officer is placed in class B by said board, the decision of such board shall not be final until the officer affected is informed of the respects in which he has been found deficient and is afforded an opportunity to be heard and to offer such records and testimony as may be pertinent to the inquiry by the board. After such hearing and findings by such board the officer affected shall have the right of appeal to the Secretary of War under such regulations as may be provided by the Secretary."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. GARRETT. To suggest what my recollection of the parliamentary status was. The matter has been voted upon viva voce and also by a standing vote, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] had demanded tellers. So I respectfully submit that the question is whether tellers shall be ordered.

Mr. KAHN. No; the point of no quorum was made, and I therefore made a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. GARRETT. Here was the situation, as I remember it: I have not the RECORD before me and I may be in error, but the question was put to the committee. There was a viva voce vote, a division was demanded, and the Chair announced ayes so many and noes so many, and thereupon the gentleman from California——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the point of no quorum set aside the entire vote.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the lack of a quorum did not develop.

Mr. GARRETT. The question of a quorum was not developed—whether there was or was not a quorum—and a motion was immediately made to rise.

Mr. KAHN. The vote was announced by the Chairman.

Mr. GARRETT. But the absence of a quorum was not determined, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; the point of no quorum being made, the committee rose, and the committee could not by that action require that the vote that was taken should be decisive.

Mr. GARRETT. No; I am not insisting that the vote was decisive, but I am insisting that the question is whether we shall have a teller vote.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know; but the demand for tellers passed away when the point of no quorum was made and invariably returns to the viva voce vote. A demand for the yeas and nays to-day might not be insisted upon to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT. I freely concede that if the absence of a quorum had been developed that would be true, but the Chair not having counted we do not know whether there was a quorum or not, and the gentleman from California immediately moved to rise.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is true, that the committee by rising could not determine a quorum was here, because it does not require a quorum to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. In the view of the Chair, it makes no difference whatever, because gentlemen will not lose their right to demand either a division or tellers. Therefore, it makes no substantial difference which way the matter is decided.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the holding of the Chair that the question now before the committee is as to whether tellers shall be ordered or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Chair pleases, a viva voce vote was announced, then tellers were taken; and would not the question before the committee now be whether we will have tellers or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum having been made, though not determined, and the committee rising without that fact having been determined, the Chair is of the opinion that the vote should be again put.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I inquire of the Chair, Does not the presumption always exist that there is a quorum until it is ascertained that there is not a quorum, and the presumption being that there was a quorum and it not having been determined that there was not a quorum, would not the question now be whether we should have tellers? That was the question before the committee when we rose as to whether or not the demand for tellers would be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The count on the division showed, though, of course, not conclusive at all, that there was no quorum——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What difference does it make? It is customary to take the vote over and no rights are lost to any gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will have exactly the same right that they had on Saturday.

Mr. CALDWELL. The fact that a quorum does not show on a division of the House does not control as to whether or not there is a quorum present, for many times Members do not vote at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CALDWELL. In this particular case, on page 4313 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it is perfectly plain——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman contend that the Chair should now hold that the amendment was adopted?

Mr. CALDWELL. No, but——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the next order of business?

Mr. CALDWELL. The next order of business would be whether or not we should have tellers on the question, because when we reached that stage and we had voted on it viva voce and upon a division then the Chair announced there were 39 ayes and 35 noes, thereupon the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE] demanded tellers. Before tellers could be ordered the point of order was made that no quorum was present and immediately the motion was made to rise without determining that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clear that the usual practice of the House under such conditions is to go back and take the vote over again. Such a procedure fully protects the rights of everyone.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division of the question. There are two separate propositions included in the amendment and I think we ought to vote upon them separately.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate where the division should be had?

Mr. SANFORD. The first portion of the amendment provides that an officer placed in class B shall have the right of a hearing and present papers and evidence. The second proposal is that he shall have an appeal from the decision of the board, two distinct proposals, and I think they are divisible.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York indicate where the amendment may be divided?

Mr. SANFORD. The last sentence in the amendment, I think, is that——

Mr. CALDWELL. You see this brings up exactly the point that we were arguing already. The amendment in its entirety has been voted upon twice and both times was carried, and the motion was on tellers on the whole amendment, and now the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] seeks to upset the action of the House and divide the question. It is certainly too late to divide the question now. I make the point of order that the request of the gentleman from New York comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that no vote has been had on this amendment. Does the gentleman contend that there has been a vote on this amendment and that it has carried?

Mr. CALDWELL. Twice, according to the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the gentleman is entirely mistaken. The Chair is unable to divide this amendment. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] will make his request, the Chair will submit it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not the vote stand 39 to 35?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum was thereupon made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me the duty of the Chair, if the Chair will permit, is to announce that the vote stood 39 to 35, and it therefore carried.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. According to that contention, 25 men in the House could carry an amendment against the point of no quorum.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but the point of no quorum was made, and it was not ascertained whether or not there was a quorum, and somebody moved that the committee rise, and the whole thing went up in smoke.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Missouri will see that if the committee could rise, thereby preventing the Chair from counting a quorum, a small minority of a quorum could agree to an amendment although the point of no quorum was made.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was seeking to convince a man who is an able parliamentarian, just like the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], that his point was wrong.

Mr. GARRETT. The situation in this particular case was somewhat different. There had been a demand for tellers. I do not think it was very important, except as it might apply to the thing the gentleman from New York is seeking now to do. The situation is this——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from New York could demand a division if tellers were ordered. It does not change the status at all. Debate would not be closed even if tellers were ordered.

Mr. GARRETT. Assuming that to be correct, the matter is not of any grave importance. But the situation is that the tellers were demanded. The committee was not precluded in any way, and there was no danger at any time of less than a quorum passing this amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have frequently seen the case, and so has the gentleman from Tennessee, where the vote was taken, the demand for the yeas and nays was made, a point of no quorum was made, and the House adjourned, while the gentleman from Missouri was Speaker, and then when the House met it paid no attention to the demand for the yeas and nays, but took the vote over again, viva voce sometimes, with no demand for the yeas and nays being made at all. It has been the invariable practice of the House, and it is for the convenience of the House. No one can possibly lose any right by a technical construction of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion, after a somewhat hasty examination of the precedents and certain citations from Jefferson's Manual, that his first impression was right, and that the question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. The gentleman from New York has asked for a division of the amendment.

Mr. IGOE. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not divisible.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the Chair hear me on that for a moment? The Chair could not hold that, it seems to me, if he has read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has read the amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. It provides two specific things. It provides, first, that the aggrieved person shall have a hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SANFORD. No; it is not a motion to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair reads the opening sentence of the amendment, it says:

After the words "class A," strike out the balance of the line and all of line 15 and insert.

Paragraph 7, Rule XVI, says:

A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I understand the amendment now before the House is the substitute that was offered by the gentleman from Texas to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE] and I would ask that the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not correctly informed. It is not.

Mr. HULINGS. What becomes of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. It was agreed to.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask unanimous consent to slightly modify the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to slightly modify his amendment. Will the gentleman from Texas indicate the modification desired?

Mr. CONNALLY. So that it will read as follows:

At the end of the Swope amendment, strike out the period, insert a colon, and then "Provided, That."

And then copy my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment with the proposed modification.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 70.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. KAHN took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska, Mr. JONES of Texas, and Mr. CONNALLY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] rise?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 35, line 11, after the word "lieutenant," strike out the words "for the remainder of their service" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "until such time as the board shall see fit to reclassify them."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the bill as drafted provides that when the men referred to have been classified by the board they shall remain second lieutenants so long as they are in the service. I can not see any good purpose in giving notice beforehand that a man shall never be entitled to promotion under any circumstances.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman has not referred to the language in line 9 defining the class of officers stated who are not qualified for further promotion. This class only relates to the class not qualified for further promotion.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes. That is what I expected it to apply to; those whom the board found were not qualified for further promotion. It seems to me that if you are going to retain them in the service you ought at least not to say that they shall never be promoted. Just fancy a man being sentenced to remain a "shave tail" all his life!

Now, if it is the purpose of the language provided in this bill to kick the second lieutenants out of the Army, if they come within that classification, then the measure should say so outright. But it seems to me that no good purpose can be served by saying beforehand that they shall never reclassify them. Suppose one of these lieutenants decides to stay in the Army and it later develops that he overcomes his deficiency and qualifies for promotion. What harm can there be in the board reclassifying him?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman does not change any language except that which he moves to strike out, he will not correct the defect.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This sentence refers to the language before, and says, "The officers so reported shall continue," and so forth.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman know that this language refers entirely to pay clerks of the Army?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I do.

Mr. KAHN. Who were made second lieutenants under the national-defense act, under the express promise that no effort would be made to get any increased rank?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It was not so nominated in the bond. They were commissioned as second lieutenants. I do not care whether they were pay clerks or on what basis they went into the Quartermaster Corps, can anyone give a sufficient reason for saying that you are going to keep second lieutenants in the Army and say, after they are classified, no matter whether they stay in the service 30 years or not, no board, no matter how much discretion they may possess, will be permitted to reclassify those second lieutenants at any time? I say if it later develops that one of these lieutenants becomes qualified for promotion, that board should promote him.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The objection is outlined by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Why do you not kick them out of the Army, then?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It has heretofore been found in many cases where it is proposed to change the Army law not advisable to change the status of men in a grade or class that is to lapse under the change, but to let the grade expire with them when they get through. We shall have no further classification like that when these men are out of it.

If the gentleman will permit one word further, I will say we have an analogous situation in this bill in what is called the medical administration corps, where we proposed that men, heretofore noncommissioned officers who have held temporary rank, may be confirmed in that rank to captain, and that is the end of it. They can not be promoted higher.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not proceed to argue analogous cases in my time. The bill does not provide that other officers shall cease when these men shall retire, and it does not place any limitation on the time they shall serve.

It provides that they shall remain second lieutenants, and although the board has classified them, that board is not permitted under the language of the act ever to reconsider its action. Now, I do not know why you should say that the man who enters there should leave all hope behind, or that you should write Ichabod in fatal letters across the brow of the man who was commissioned as a second lieutenant under the act of July 3, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. These second lieutenants, as I understand, are the men who are not in the fighting forces or are not those who sought to be in the fighting forces?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman is mistaken. They were assigned as were the others. They are in the Army.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Why do you not say that?

Mr. JONES of Texas. You are going to put upon that board the duty to classify these men, and having classified them as second lieutenants for the remainder of the time they are in the service, they can never hold a higher position. They might serve 20 years, and the same board might be of the opinion that while a particular officer who 20 years before was a second lieutenant was not qualified then for promotion, that that same man was now qualified for promotion. The point I make is, What is the use in saying they shall never be reclassified? The matter is wholly in the hands of the board. I say they should remain second lieutenants until such time as the board may see fit to reclassify them. Why do you want to hamstring and hog-tie the board? Why not give them the same continuing discretion that you give them at the outset?

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman no doubt remembers his Dante. Does he remember the inscription at the entrance of hell, "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here"?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; that is exactly the effect of the stipulation written into the bill. One of the proudest things in connection with the history of this Republic is the fact that no matter what position a man may occupy, he can look forward to something better in the future. But under the terms and the language in this act which I have sought to strike out he can, no matter if he lives a hundred years, never be raised above the level of a second lieutenant, and you destroy the initiative, you destroy hope for efficient service, you destroy the motive that prompts a man to any line of activity when you say that no matter how efficient he may be or how many years he may serve, he can not only not be promoted, but his superior officers shall have no authority to promote him.

I can not see any reason at all for putting in that kind of language. I have heard the old expression, "Hitch your wagon to a star"; but if a man is compelled to be a second lieutenant all his life how is he ever going to find a star or hope to find one?

Mr. McKEOWN. Are these men of a special class?

Mr. JONES of Texas. They are of a special class. They are the pay clerks who were put in the Army under the act of June 3, 1916, and by the terms of this bill they are continued.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is it the purpose of this bill to end that class?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is not so provided in the bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. A man would not have any hope of being more than a second lieutenant if he joined now in that class, would he?

Mr. JONES of Texas. If you are going to have them remain in the bill there is no reason why the board shall never find that it has made a mistake. I trust this board is not considered omniscient. Though the board is granted remarkable powers, I suppose it is not believed that it can not make a mistake. But it must classify these men as second lieutenants, and they are forever barred from promotion. I say that is not just. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I imagine that the gentleman from Texas does not understand the situation under which these men were put into the Army as commissioned officers. They were civilians in the employ of the Government up to June 3, 1916. Their employment was rather precarious. They were the personal appointees of the paymasters of the Army, and if a paymaster went out of the Army the clerk who had been with him was liable to go out of the Army if the successor of the paymaster who went out did not reappoint his clerk. The committee of the House felt that that was rather a hard position for those men to occupy. Sometimes they were in the Army, sometimes they were out of the Army, and in order that they should have a permanent status Congress passed this provision of the law of June 3, 1916, that they should all be covered into the commissioned personnel of the Army as second lieutenants. It was distinctly understood that they were not going to seek any higher grade than that of second lieutenant.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. These men are no longer civilians; and if they are in the Army, why should they not have the fullest opportunity for rising in the Army if you keep them there?

Mr. KAHN. Because they are simply doing certain clerical work that can be done by civilians, but, in order to make their tenure permanent, they were given this commissioned status.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does it not amount to this, that this section of the bill is not a means of inducing any men to come into the Army with the idea that they can not go any further? It is not a means of entrance that anybody will use hereafter. It simply takes care of some men who, under the mistaken philosophy of another law, were given this rank.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We are not going to give it to anybody else for that purpose, and the rank will expire when these men cease their service in the Army.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say that when we passed the law, I think, 16 of these pay clerks, by reason of their advanced age, immediately went on the retired list, whereas if we had not given them this rank they would have dropped out of the service entirely without any future.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Suppose a commanding officer should think one of these second lieutenants so efficient and capable that he wanted to make him a captain in the Quartermaster Corps. He could not do it.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; he could. He could resign from that position and receive a new appointment.

Mr. KAHN. He could resign from his old status and be appointed into the other.

Mr. McKENZIE. Was not the real purpose of this legislation after all to give these clerks a retired status which they took advantage of?

Mr. KAHN. I always felt that way, and I always opposed the legislation; but the House in its wisdom adopted it, and I simply want to state the circumstances under which it was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 34, line 9, after the word "officers," strike out the word "which" and insert "none of which shall be a member of the General Staff and which after due inquiry into the record of their service in the Army."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for a single promotion list, which I favor. It also provides for the elimination and retirement from the service of officers who are supposedly unfit to continue in the service. Those that are considered fit and qualified to remain are to be placed in class A, while those who are found to be unfit and disqualified from remaining in the service are to be placed in class B.

Theoretically this sounds fine. If there is any agency that can accurately determine who the unfit officers are, the scheme will work. The agency provided for in section 24b is a board composed of five general officers. So far as the terms of the bill are concerned, these general officers may be all from the General Staff, or all from the Staff Corps, or all from the line. They may be all from the Cavalry, or all from the Infantry, or all from any other single branch of the service.

In my judgment, it would be most unwise to have that board made up of officers from either the General Staff or the Staff Corps. It is for this reason that in the amendment that I have offered I have provided that no member of this board shall be a member of the General Staff.

Then there is this other objection that occurs to me. If I am any judge of the sentiment of this House, I will say that this House is almost unanimously against promotion by selection. I believe that the Military Affairs Committee share this view. I believe that they recognize the advisability of retiring certain officers and the necessity of amending existing law to accomplish that purpose. I do not believe that they desire to make it possible for favoritism or acquaintance to influence either promotion or retirement, yet we have seen that the original draft of the section provided that the finding by this board should be absolute and final without review. This the House has changed.

So far as this bill is concerned, no restrictions whatever are placed upon the board to guide and direct them in the classifying of officers. So far as the bill is concerned, one officer may be placed in class B because one or more members of the board may not like him personally, while another officer may be placed in class A, regardless of his qualifications otherwise, because one or more officers of the board know and like him personally.

The human equation is bound to enter into any judgment by any board. It should, therefore, be the duty of Congress, by proper restrictions, to restrict that to the minimum; but this bill places no restriction or qualifications whatsoever upon the right and power of this board to retire any officer from the service.

For this reason, my amendment provides that the board shall make the classification after inquiry into and regard for the officer's service. What better method of ascertaining a man's qualifications is there than the officer's service in the Army? If this amendment is not adopted, the bill will become a law with no standard whatever for the instruction and guidance of this board in deciding who shall go into class A and remain in the service and who shall go into class B and be discharged or retired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How would you and I as laymen undertake to write into the law what that standard should be?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It seems to me that any standard, of course, is necessarily imperfect. An officer can not be really tried out until he has been in combat and undergone that ordeal. The best kind of an examination is only a makeshift.

But an examination is better than no examination. A man's record in the service is something. With this particular provision you permit this general board of officers to rely upon intangible things. The moment you do that there is an advantage to a man who is a personal acquaintance of members of the board. I say that not with any idea of unjustly criticizing the board. But in the very nature of things, if I am on a board of five officers and I know one of the men that comes up for consideration who stands No. 2 on the list and I do not know the man that stands No. 1, and there is one little thing against him—it may be 10 years back—I am, because of personal knowledge arising from acquaintance, going to unconsciously vote in favor of the man who ranks No. 2 and place him above No. 1.

Mr. McKENZIE. I assume that my colleague understands that this is not a section that has to do at all with promotions. The thing the gentleman suggests can not happen. This section is intended to eliminate men and not to promote men.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is preliminary to promotion, because they may become eliminated and therefore can not be promoted.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What kind of an organization would it be in which men, in order to be certain of the integrity and fairness of any board of fellow officers that might pass on their qualifications, must always keep aloof from that board an acquaintance with its personnel, at the same time never knowing who might be put on the board? Any man in the Army would have to live a hermit life in order not to go up against a board that would not favor anybody.

I have made that statement extravagant but that is what it seems to me the gentleman's good intention comes to, as he expresses it in the language he has chosen.

You have got to find men all of whom are strangers to the candidates and that means no confidence in human nature.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; that could not be done. I would so safeguard it that this board, the board of five general officers, might not be all members of the General Staff.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman sees nothing inherently wrong in the General Staff that prevents them from exercising honesty and candor.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will not read into my remarks something that I expressly disclaim.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I believe that the great majority of these men will handle the matters fairly, but during the late war there were instances where men of influence, men with acquaintances here in Washington, on the General Staff and otherwise, have been permitted to hold temporary positions and thereby command their seniors in the Regular Establishment because of this acquaintance.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will suggest to the gentleman that the General Staff, like all other sections of the service, is constantly changing in personnel. Limiting it to the General Staff, in the language of the gentleman's amendment, simply means that you limit it at this moment to persons on the General Staff, but you may have some objectionable person on the General Staff, according to his theory, in a few weeks.

Moreover, if the gentleman will pardon me—and I will get him more time, if I can—so far, if there is any particular thing that stands out in the record of the officers high in command in the administration of the Army, it is the fact that even being the son of a general does not help him from being kicked out of West Point when he does not qualify. Time after time I have known that thing to happen. I believe the Army does act on honor. I believe it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman is again touching on something that I expressly disclaim. The gentleman will not deny that there have been gross acts of injustice done in reference to rank during the late war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. War is a time of turmoil and intense struggle everywhere.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That being the case, I want to avoid these injustices in a time of peace.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This is a thing to be done in the normal routine of peace and probably would not operate as the gentleman says it has in time of war.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What objection would the gentleman have to a provision specifying that the five general officers comprising this board should be men of the line and not of the General Staff?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How would our soldier friend who is a member of one of the staff corps feel if his case were to be decided by a line officer, a man not in touch with that section of the service?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not believe that a line officer would ever attempt to do anything against a staff officer if he figures on staying in the Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think my friend is under a misapprehension; staff officers, as such, have no authority to keep a man in the service or turn him out.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I want to confine it so that the officers of the General Staff will not have any right to say who shall remain in or go out of the service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The General Staff will be made up of details of men from every branch of the service—from the line, from all the supply corps, and everything else.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; but men on the board not on the General Staff would not come under the influence of the power of the General Staff here in Washington.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What is that?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. A man that comes from the outside would not be in touch with or under the influence of the General Staff.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not think that makes much difference; the General Staff comes from the outside.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; and the policy goes on forever.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, a temporary change, at that. They are flowing in and flowing out, just as men do to other details of the service in the Army.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What objection would the gentleman have to the provision for due inquiry into and regard for their service in the Army? You have absolutely nothing prescribing the duties of this board. All you say is that the board shall "arrange it." So far as the bill is concerned they may arrange it in accordance with their whim, their desire, or acquaintance, and not upon a man's service. It seems to me that this Congress should write in there that this arrangement shall be in accordance with a man's service and not in accordance with the whim or the desire or the mere wish of the members of the board.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. An officer in such a position, or any Government official under his oath of office, is presumed to be carrying out the intent of the law and not merely his whim. You do not write into laws safeguards that no officer administering the law shall ever carry out his whims. You do not write anything like that into a law.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; but we ought to put in a positive statement of what in general shall govern them, and not give them unlimited power.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The only purpose of that section is expressed in its general terms, because we laymen do not know exactly how to define in particularity what professional and technical qualifications shall be insisted upon. All it provides for is that the men who do answer the technical and professional and efficiency tests shall go into the list for promotion, and those who do not shall go out.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does not a man's service in the Army count for anything?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] a moment ago asked a very practical question: What is the matter with the General Staff that they shall not be allowed to do this thing? I want to pay a compliment to the General Staff. Many of them are competent and are fine men, and I do not mean to assail them. The difficulty is this: The business of the General Staff is to come here to Washington and, to be honest, it is civilian work that they do. It is necessary work and important work, and I do not want to decry them. The business of the men in the line is to go out into the mountains and wherever there is a little trouble, and learn to command men and to handle soldiers. A man in the staff does not learn unless he has had the other experience, and they are very naturally a bunch of fellows who, however brilliant, however capable, if they went to war—no doubt they would be in such circumstances—yet are nothing but a bunch of civilians, giving orders to men at arms.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the General Staff are composed of men who are taken from the line, who have had the kind of service of which the gentleman is proud and of which we are all proud?

Mr. LITTLE. I will answer that. What is the line man? He commands a company here or a battalion there. He does not get around to Washington. He has to do with soldiers all of the time, and when the war begins he is thrown into the firing line. He is the soldier. The General Staff represents the civilians of the Army and the line men represent the fighting men of the Army. A staff man may have been a line man, but not in war. The men who were always getting staff jobs in the Philippines hold them now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but I would rather finish first.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What was one of the abuses in the gentleman's time but paper administration work for the line men? Is not that true?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; and if you will give me a little time I will dispose of that. They have their paper work to do yet. Take the General Staff. They are a few individuals here. It has been so always. It does not make any difference whether you call it the General Staff. It is the fellows who do the work here. Seventy-five years ago that bunch put U. S. Grant out of the Army as incompetent. When the Civil War began and he wrote in after another job, for a chance to be lieutenant, they never even answered his letter. That shows all the sense that they had or ever do have on the real war business.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. No; not now. Some gentleman says that there was no General Staff at that time. There were the men here in Washington who did the civilian work for the Army, and they were the General Staff, whether you call them a general staff or not. The law is being changed, but the bunch of fellows sitting around here bossing the men at a distance who are doing the work kicked Grant out of the Army as an incompetent, and when he applied for a job when the war began they refused to give it to him, and men like Grant and Sheridan and fellows like that had to go out of the Regular Army and go to the governors of the various States and get a job with them or they would not have entered the war at all on either side. That is the kind of fellows who constitute the General Staff. They are red-tape worms.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota rose.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, in just a minute. One of them retired the other day with distinguished everything, I guess, except what you could get by fighting—about the highest job in the Army. He has been 45 years in the Army and he was never under fire in his life, and any man who can stay in the Army for 45 years and keep out of battle has nothing to boast of.

Mr. LAYTON. He was smart, was he not?

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, they are all smart. That is not all; but if you and I sat about there we would pick our friends and favorites, and they do, and so there is a constant roll of dead timber in there, and the active fighting man never gets in there, practically never. That is what is the matter. Do you want your Army run by civilians or by soldiers, by fighting men or by men who get up law here that provides that they shall have distinguished service medals for their great responsibility?

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. In a minute. For distinguished service! Gen. March testified the other day that the distinguished service medals could not be given to a private, as they could not have any responsibility. They do not know that the greatest responsibility of the Army is the responsibility of dying for your country, and every private submits to it and mighty few of these fellows down here do. Hanging around the committee all the time, they got through a law which allows them to cover each other with medals like a boys' parade, and they took away the honors already given to brave men in the ranks. Those officers actually think they are worthier of credit sitting at a desk here and buying five saddles for one horse than are the gallant boys who carried rifles at Chateau-Thierry.

They have already demoted the officers who won silver leaves and eagles and stars in Europe and now they want you to authorize them to throw the war soldiers out of their peace Army.

They are useful; some of them are necessary; but, gentlemen, do not come and tell me they are soldiers in the same breath you speak of the heroes of Cantigny. The gentleman has been on the Military Committee long enough——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask to proceed for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. In just a minute. The gentleman has been on the committee long enough not to ask such a question, and he ought to know the difference between the staff and a fighting man.

Mr. PELL. Can the gentleman tell who it was who was 45 years in the Army and——

Mr. LITTLE. I could.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman do so?

Mr. LITTLE. I would rather not.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman can find that out in the newspapers.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. LITTLE. I think he is a good man and a valuable man, but he just happened that way.

Mr. PELL. The gentleman did not mean to hurt his feelings.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman from Kansas think the provisions of sections (a) and (b) as to the way the General Staff shall be organized will in large measure obviate any objection which may have existed in the past? I call his attention specifically to the fact that section (b) provides that those shall be eligible who have fought at the front in France during the late war.

Mr. LITTLE. I asked the committee if they would agree a day or two ago that nobody could be eligible for appointment at the head of the staff or the bureaus except a man who had been in the war, and they said no.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will read this to the gentleman:

(b) Those officers who since April 6, 1917, have commanded a division or higher tactical units or have demonstrated by actual service in the World War that they are qualified for General Staff duty.

Mr. LITTLE. They are in the service?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes. Who have "demonstrated by actual service in the World War."

Mr. LITTLE. What has that got to do with the principle the gentleman from Minnesota was asking about?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think it would answer the gentleman's objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Actual service——

Mr. DEMPSEY. In the World War.

Mr. LITTLE. Where, in Washington?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think that means——

Mr. LITTLE. Or putting in most of their time before the Committee on Military Affairs telling them about it?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It is stated here, "who have commanded a division or higher tactical units or have demonstrated by actual service in the World War that they are qualified for General Staff duty"; that is, that they have seen service in the field.

Mr. LITTLE. They do not have that kind of service. A man who commanded at a camp would fill that bill. If they meant battle service they would say so.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think that is the clear meaning.

Mr. LITTLE. Was there somebody else who wanted to ask me a question?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me—I have been listening to him—are we to understand that we are going to get up a war especially to prepare people for the General Staff? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. Well, now, that is a very curious question. Let us look at it for a minute. We have had a war. There are thousands of men with experience in it, and I say go and pick among those experienced fighting men, who understand what the staff do not. When they are dead and gone we will do the best we can. Going to get up another war? What has that got to do with it? We are discussing present conditions.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And that is as far as we are looking, apparently.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman thinks he is looking ahead, but evidently he does not realize that every fellow in the department who did not go to war, and never will, can arrange for five men to put anybody out of the Army they do not like. That is what they will do. This is the most infamous thing I have ever heard of in an Army bill. The idea of allowing the staff here, civilians of the Army, to pick men out, men who did not get before your committee, and then fire them out of the Army without a hearing or an appeal. Why, great God, gentlemen, can not you see the mere fact that they would offer a suggestion such as that shows it is not the proper thing to allow them the power or comes from a proper source? They demoted the men from Europe and they still hold their higher rank and swell around in the medals they won in Washington. If the committee understood what they are doing they would not have one single thing to do with such a thing. Kill it. It is said amend it, but it would have to be amended so much that there would be nothing left. After all, there is only one way to get rid of a rattlesnake, and that is to kill him. This is a rattlesnake. That is all there is to it. They did such things in Germany. A day ago those fellows seized the capital. You can not go to your constituents and tell them why you allowed civilian soldiers in the department to pick out five men, without any right of trial or appeal, to fire any of the fighting boys out of the Army. That is what they are trying to do. They are beginning to do so. They have their lists ready now—a long list of fighting men. Dead timber? They are the dead timber. The fellows on the staff, they are the ones who ought to get out. Ask them to decide who are the dead timber? If you do this, instead of getting out dead timber you are arranging a forest of dead timber, petrified for all the years. Now, gentlemen, I appeal to you. Are you for Halleck or Grant? Look this question in the face and see what there is to it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I always like to hear the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], but he has gotten things a little mixed. The General Staff of the Army is made up of line officers—fighting men.

The Staff Corps to which he refers, or which he had in mind, is made up of officers who do not go to the front. Now, up to 1901 there was no General Staff. The Staff Corps here in Washington dominated the Army, and then the fighting officers proposed the organization of the General Staff, so that the fighting branch of the Army could have an organization here to formulate plans for the conduct of the Army, plans for training the soldiers, and various other military plans. These officers referred to in this section are General Staff officers—fighting officers—the very kind the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] wants. There is not a Staff Corps officer among them; and I submit that in view of the situation the amendment should be voted down.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last 10 words.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. KAHN. No. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. LITTLE. He is referring to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman says the members of the staff are fighting men. I say they are not.

Mr. KAHN. The General Staff, I said.

Mr. LITTLE. I heard you. Two years ago I asked you in the House, when you said that some of the "experts" were fighting men, to give a list of the battles in which they had participated, and you took three days to do it, and about the only fighting man in the bunch was Dan Craig, of our district, who served in the Twentieth Kansas and in Frank Bell's regiment, and had more battles to his credit than all the rest put together. Three brothers went to Manila in the Twentieth Kansas. One was killed at the Rio Tulijuan. A second, Col. Craig, was the first of our officers of high rank to be killed in Europe. Dan came home a brigadier, and was immediately demoted, while Frank Coe, a Kansan, who went to West Point in 1892, and never commanded troops in action in his life, except, possibly, when 29 rounds were fired in France by a battery of his, could demote Col. Ben Kerfoot, a Twentieth Kansan, who commanded a regiment of heavy artillery in the Argonne. Frank Coe, or his kind, now ask you to let them run such men out of the Army.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported and the paragraph read as it will read if amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment and the paragraph as it would read if amended.

The amendment was again reported, and the paragraph read as it would read if amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska offers an amendment as follows: On page 34, on line 15, after the words "Secretary of War," incorporated in the section by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE], insert the following: "in the following manner only: When an officer shall have been placed in class B he shall, within a reasonable time, be notified of such classification, and within 20 days thereafter, if he desires to appeal from such classification, send through the usual channels his notice of appeal. Thereupon the Secretary of War shall convene a reviewing board, consisting of three general officers of equal or higher rank than that of the original board, and no two of whom shall be of the same branch of the service. Such demoted officer shall be given notice of the time and place of hearing the particulars in which he was found deficient, and shall be allowed a reasonable time in which to prepare and present his showing with reference thereto, and there shall be presented on behalf of the original board all facts upon which the finding of said board was based and such additional facts as are material to determine the efficiency or inefficiency of such demoted officer, to all of which such officer shall have full opportunity to answer by proper evidence, and the finding and recommendation of such reviewing board, based only on matters appearing at such hearing, shall be final. A record of the entire hearing, including all proceedings and orders, shall be kept and preserved and such officer shall, on demand, receive a correct and duly authentic copy thereof."

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, under the condition that is presented by this section, as it is now amended by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE], there is no chance to correct the order given to the officers so placed on list B. You will notice under the provisions of the section, without any hearing, without any record, the officer is placed on list B. You will notice also that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky in no way preserves the right of review, although in express terms it seems so to do. The only thing that would go to the Secretary of War would be the findings of that board, because no evidence is taken, and if the Army has any officers who are of the rank provided for in this section, who could not make a finding which would warrant the Secretary in approving or placing of the officer on list B, there is something wrong with his gray matter.

Now, then, the officer having been placed on list B, under the amendment I have just presented is notified of the matters in which he is deficient, and the time is fixed and an additional opportunity is created for a hearing before a board, which comes from different branches of the service, and then a hearing is had upon his deficiency and a record is made.

It has been said by those who favor the section in its original condition that the only purpose they have in mind is to remove the deadwood, and that these officers are going to act honestly—their interest in the Army and in its future being the criterion which guides them in this action. But the same rule would blot out every law that we have for the control of civilians. The laws are not made to take care of those who are honest; they are made to take care of those who are dishonest, either in civil transactions or criminal work. And so this provision is put in here to take care of the honest officer; efficient, if you please, against whom some dishonest officer seeks an advantage.

I have, as you will notice, kept review entirely within the Army. I have taken it away from the Secretary of War, because it is urged that the men who are interested in the officer who is going to be demoted, and who is deficient, will, by political influence, secure his retention. In this I have left it with the Army officers. I have also, if you will notice, done this: I have required that the record of that hearing shall be preserved, and that he may be able to get it at any time upon demand. I have personally had a case within my knowledge where they refused to furnish the records.

It has these elements, too, to commend it: The very fact that the first board knows that their action will be reviewed by another board, different from them, will tend to make them more careful in their action, and the fact that a record is preserved will tend to make both boards act carefully and honestly. I think this amendment will cure the difficulties many of us see in the section.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. SWOPE. Does the gentleman's amendment state who shall convene the appeal board?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes. The Secretary of War shall do it. I provide that the Secretary of War shall review the action of the board in the following manner, and then provide for this board of appeals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, in writing this section, had nothing "put over on them," as was stated here the other day, but understood perfectly what we were trying to do, and that is to eliminate from the Military Establishment unfit officers. The section as written will do it.

But there seems to be a feeling in the minds of a great many Members of the House that the officer affected ought to have some appeal. The amendment we adopted on Saturday provides for an appeal to the civilian Secretary of War. In my judgment that appeal absolutely destroys the force of the provision by opening the door to political pull and the calling in of powerful friends to save the inefficient officer from dismissal from the service.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] in a way provides for appeal, which, of course, is dear to the heart of every American. We believe in that system. It then calls upon the Secretary of War to name another board as an appeal board to review the proceedings and to find out whether or not the original board had made an error. For that reason I have no serious objection to it.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I want to know if the gentleman from Illinois and any other member of the Committee on Military Affairs would want to go home to their constitituents and in their capacity as lawyers in civil courts would want to try cases under a law which carried a provision in it to the effect that the findings of the court shall not be subject to review? I think it is the most drastic piece of legislation ever written—that a set of men could sit in a chamber somewhere and condemn a man with no other provision or mode of making a living, and kick him out and say he shall have no chance of review.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to my colleague from Illinois that for one I am willing to go home and stand before my people and explain why I stood for this provision. This does not provide for a criminal trial. The purpose of this is to get rid of inefficient officers. What right has an inefficient officer to a retrial; in fact, to any claim on the people of the United States?

Mr. JUUL. He ought to have an opportunity of finding out whether he is or not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would my colleague think it desirable, when a Member of Congress goes before his constituents and is defeated, that he should have a chance to appeal to a higher board to determine whether he should be returned or not, there having been only one chance before? You propose to give two. Why not three?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to my colleague from Illinois that I have never been deceived by this legislation. I have heard men year after year on this floor denounce and condemn the inefficient officers in our Military Establishment, and they were right, because we have them. This provision provides a way to get rid of them, and when we undertake to do that the same men, I am sorry to say, rise immediately as the champions of the inefficient officer.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that under the amendment that has just been presented and which we are now considering an Army officer must still review the conduct of the man, and the only thing it does is to guard against an injustice?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is true.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. What would happen if the inefficient officer happened to be a member of this board?

Mr. McKENZIE. Well, that is a question that I can not answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. CONNALLY for the amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 34, line 15, at the end of the Swope amendment, strike out the period, insert a colon, and the following: "Provided, That in any case in which an officer is placed in class B by said board the decision of such board shall not be final until the officer affected is informed in writing of the respect in which he has been found deficient and is afforded an opportunity to be heard and to offer such records and testimony as may be pertinent to the inquiry by the board. After such hearing and findings by such board the officer affected shall have the right of appeal to the Secretary of War under such regulations as may be provided by the Secretary."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will state that my substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] begins at the end of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE] and then reads, "Provided, That," and then contains the same language as was contained in my amendment which was offered on Saturday.

I should like to say to the Republican side of the House, as I said on Saturday, that I did not offer my amendment in any spirit of derogation of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE]. I have heard a great deal of comment on the Republican side that if I did not draw my amendment so as to swallow the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky there would be no objection to the adoption of my amendment, and I will say that the members of the committee have assured me that if I would modify it in that way the committee would have no objection to it. I sought to modify my amendment this morning so as to meet the views of the committee, but objection was made. I am not hostile to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. I am willing to accord to him all the credit to which his service in this House and without it entitles him. I regard him as a very efficient Member of the majority side of this House. But, gentlemen, my view of the matter is this: You have got to have a canning board. There is no doubt about that, because if you promote officers according to one list and an officer knows that automatically he is going to be promoted when his number on the list is reached unless there is some agency somewhere either to reward him for his efficiency or punish him for his inefficiency, you will destroy initiative and ambition to make himself proficient in the service. So you have either got to have promotion by selection or you have got to have an elimination board. But in providing an elimination board let us provide one that is consistent with the principles of equity and of fair play and of justice. Why, gentlemen of the majority side of this House, if one of your colored constituents happens to be a messenger in one of the departments, under the civil-service rules he can not be deprived of his job unless he has a hearing, unless he has charges presented against him and is afforded an opportunity to vindicate himself. But under the language of this bill as drawn by the committee an honorable officer in the Army, though he bears upon his body the scars of battle, may be sent from the Army in disgrace because five officers in the War Department may find not that he has committed some act of delinquency, not that he has been guilty of cowardice on the field of battle, not that he has not an honorable and an upright character, but forsooth because they may decide that he is temperamentally unfit to command troops he may be sent from the Army in disgrace.

The trouble with the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was that it simply said that the review should be approved by the Secretary of War. My objection is that the officer may be indicted, tried, condemned, and executed before he may have any knowledge whatever of the pendency of the charges.

I am not presenting this matter as a partisan question. My God, gentlemen of the majority, must partisanship come into every question? We should not legislate as partisans. We are legislating for the Army which is to defend all of us if necessity may arise therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask for two minutes more, please.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think I shall need five minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. If gentlemen are to ask me questions, I shall need five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman wanted two minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, so that he may answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming reserve the right to object?

Mr. MONDELL. We are making no progress at all on the bill. We are now going back to a paragraph of the bill that was passed over.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; we are not.

Mr. MONDELL. We are taking up a great deal of time discussing matters that have been discussed already at great length.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming object? Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In the gentleman's investigations of this subject has he ascertained the fact that in the American Expeditionary Forces a very valuable officer was dismissed from the service after having been twice sent by this board to the insane wards of two hospitals and in each instance found to be mentally sound?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I have not discovered that; but I take it from his interrogatory that he must have found such a case as a member of the investigating committee.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is absolutely true.

Mr. CONNALLY. But I will say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana that while that particular case had never been called to my attention, I can cite him to a case in which this board, which they have already established in anticipation of this legislation and is now functioning in the War Department, took action regarding an officer.

I had my attention called to the case of an officer who was stationed at an Army post away out in the West. He did not know that charges had been preferred against him or that his record had been questioned, and the first notice he had was that he was practically out of the service, because he had been placed in class B. He journeyed to the capital at Washington at his own expense, and when he reached Washington and went down before the board he found that it did not have his complete record; that it had absolutely made a blunder; and when he went into the files of the War Department and dug up his real record the board unhesitatingly put him back in class A. But now let us assume that the board had been unwilling to place him back in class A. Under the terms of the bill as written he would have had no recourse and no appeal. The edict of this board written in some secret chamber would have been without appeal. The ukase of these military masters could never have been reviewed. The fiat of this injunction in chambers could never have been dissolved by any authority on the face of God's green earth.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman's personal experience has been, so far as he has had any experience, that this board is reasonable and does reopen these hearings and give justice to the men who appeal to them?

Mr. CONNALLY. I only know of one case, and in that case it did. But the gentleman from New York forgets the point. I shall never vote to place such unlimited authority over the record, the service, the honor, and fortunes of any citizen of my country in any board without review. Such power should not be vested in any military board or civil tribunal. Such despotic and autocratic power should have no place anywhere in a Republic and shall never be set up by my vote.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know very much about the inefficients in the Army, though I have no doubt there are some. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] just now stated that if you had some friend who occupied a subordinate position in one of the departments, he could not be dismissed without a hearing and a trial. What is the result? None of them are dismissed. The heads of the departments have recommended for years that some legislation be enacted by which they could get rid of the inefficients and the aged who have become unserviceable.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In just a moment I will. We formerly carried a provision in the legislative appropriation bill forbidding the use of any of the money to pay the salaries of people who were not efficient.

No one was ever dismissed under that provision of the law, but every year the heads of the departments asked for some way to get rid of these inefficients. Now I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman feel that if the civil-service law carried a retirement provision on a percentage basis, as this bill does, would that make any difference?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would not get rid of them, but it would help. But the difficulty is that you can not get the head of a department ordinarily, or the head of a bureau ordinarily, to prefer charges against anyone if he has got to go into the trial of a lawsuit. He prefers to leave the man undisturbed. He does not want to become involved in that kind of a controversy. That is human nature, and whatever legislation you may pass you have always got to remember what human nature will do.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; I can not yield. I voted for the Swope amendment for the purpose of giving the Secretary of War power to correct unintentional errors. I do not know that I am specially opposed to the pending amendment, but I do know that whenever you provide that a board of officers, in order to recommend the discharge of a man in the Army for inefficiency have got to be prepared to go into a trial or a lawsuit—and that it what this means—you will not get them to make a recommendation unless the case is so bald that the fellow will not answer.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No. I answer the gentleman the way he generally answers requests to yield. I do not propose to ask for an extension of time. I think we ought to have a method of getting rid of inefficiency in the civil service, which we have not got, and much more to get rid of inefficiency in the Army, which we have not now and which we will not have if this amendment is agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to close all debate on this amendment. I want to say that as far as I am concerned I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I want five minutes, but if the chairman of the committee accepts the amendment I do not care to be heard.

Mr. KAHN. The chairman can not accept an amendment, but I state my position on the matter. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended by the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

Page 37, line 11——

Mr. BANKHEAD. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have an amendment to section 24 which I wish to offer.

Mr. KAHN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withhold my amendment. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. There is a motion pending offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] to strike out all of the paragraph on classification of officers. I think, perhaps, we ought to vote first on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that that motion is not pending. It was offered to be voted on at the proper time.

Mr. KAHN. I understood that all amendments to this section have been submitted.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from California that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas was only to strike out a part of section 24b.

Mr. LITTLE. That is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Through an error of the Clerk he read it as if it was the entire section. This morning I asked unanimous consent to have it corrected, and the RECORD was corrected accordingly.

Mr. KAHN. Very well; at the proper time I shall ask for a vote on the proposition.

Mr. GRIFFIN. May I also say that my interest in the matter is because I have an amendment to strike out the entire section.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not present this morning when the arrangement was made, but he is informed that it would be proper first to vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, when this bill came up I moved to amend by putting this amendment on the first section in order to get it before the House. When we got it started again, I moved to strike out the first two lines. There has been some misunderstanding about it, and I really intended to make a motion to strike it all out. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] will offer that amendment. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment to strike out the first few lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk that I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, after line 5, strike out the entire section.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Do I understand from the reading of the amendment that the gentleman proposes to strike out the whole section or only down to and including line 13, page 35?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is the idea.

Mr. CALDWELL. It was not so reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk reported the amendment as given to him in writing. Does the gentleman from New York desire to modify his amendment?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; I ask that it be so modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, after line 5, strike out all of section 24b from line 6, on page 34, down to and including line 13 on page 35.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we have spent a great deal of time on this section, and I hope the gentleman will be able to conclude his remarks in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California object?

Mr. KAHN. Can not the gentleman from New York try to finish his remarks in five minutes, and if he asks for a further extension possibly we can allow it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California object?

Mr. KAHN. I object.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to pay my compliments to the committee in charge of this bill not only for their achievement but for the courteous and tolerant spirit which they have displayed in its progress on this floor. At the same time I hope it will be understood that anything said in the heat of debate is not in any manner to be considered as in derogation of their honesty of purpose. In regard to this particular section of the bill, the most that I would dare avow is that the committee has been most egregiously deceived by specious reasoning. When I said the other day that this section of the bill creates a star chamber I was deeply in earnest and believe its powers and methods of procedure will justify the appellation.

The section provides for the appointment of a board of five general officers who are to arrange all officers into two classes. In class A they are to put all officers who, in their opinion—I emphasize the words "in their opinion"—should be retained in the service. In class B all officers who should not be retained. It provides that their opinion, however reached, shall not be subject to review. This is a departure from the slightly more liberal provision of the Wadsworth bill (sec. 44). All the officers in class B shall then be subject to the scrutiny of a board of three officers to be convened to determine whether their service has been honest and faithful. If the finding is in the negative, the officers shall be discharged from the Army. If, however, they find that the officer's service has been honest and faithful, what then? Why, he is to be discharged also! The only distinction between the sheep and the goats being that if the officer's service has been under 10 years he will get one year's pay. If over 10 years, he is retired on a miserable pittance. In other words, the man whose service for 9 years and 364 days has been honest and faithful meets the same fate and is treated with as little consideration as the man whose service has not been honest and faithful—except that in the case of the honest and faithful servant he receives one year's pay. But all his service, all his sacrifices, all his dreams of ambition in his chosen profession are shattered by the ipse dixit of five general officers!

In order to remedy its harshness an amendment has been proposed to permit the findings of the Board of General Officers to be reviewed. But by whom? By the Secretary of War, who will probably name the General Board and who will inevitably strain a point to sustain their finding. Another amendment proposes that before the decision of the board becomes final the officer placed in class B shall be afforded an opportunity to be heard, and from its findings shall have the opportunity to appeal to the Secretary of War "under such regulations as may be provided by the Secretary." Under this what is to prevent the Secretary of War from prescribing unreasonable and exacting regulations impossible of fulfillment? You can not cure this section by anything short of complete elimination, and that is the purpose of my amendment. I propose that the whole section be stricken out.

First. Because there is no occasion for it. There is ample machinery under the law as it stands to eliminate the unfit without putting this drastic, autocratic power into the hands of a purely caste court.

Second. Because under it an officer may be stripped of honors and emoluments, and even the right of citizenship, upon hearsay and opinion evidence.

I shall not read, but shall append to my remarks, a letter published in the Army and Navy Register of February 21, 1920. It criticizes the section of the Wadsworth bill devoted to this star-chamber court, but its comments are even applicable in greater degree to this offensive section of the Kahn bill. The writer, evidently an Army officer, gives extracts from Army orders and forms issued by The Adjutant General giving instructions as to how the "efficiency reports" are to be made. For instance, in Form No. 429, A. G. O., there is the following instruction:

A copy of any unfavorable entry of opinion (in 19 specified questions) will not be furnished the officer.

In other words, the opinion of a biased, unfair, and vindictive commanding officer will pass along in darkness through military subterranean channels from commanding officer to lineal superiors without opportunity being given to the subordinate officer affected to defend his name or his reputation. When the dark stream of biased opinion finally reaches the ultimate bouncing board the Lord only knows how much its pollution may be further augmented. This practice is in vogue to-day, and still the little clique of the high and mightiest are not content. They want their methods to receive the sanction of Congress. They want the santification of the law for the erection of a court to punish officers for the crime of not having the favorable opinion of some crabbed martinet.

What chance would Gen. Grant have had if such methods were in vogue in his time?

A few years before the Civil War Gen. Grant was chopping wood on a farm outside of St. Louis, carting it into the town and peddling it. He had been a captain in the United States Army. When the war began he was found in Springfield, Ill., seeking an opportunity to render service to his country. Tied up with red tape, blocked by technical objections, thrust aside and elbowed by newer, younger men, his efforts were in vain. An application of his, years afterwards, was found curled up in one of the files of the War Department—an application to Gen. McClellan to give him a command. It remains to the everlasting honor of a civilian governor of the State of Illinois to give to Grant the first opportunity that he had to show his phenomenal ability. And we may congratulate ourselves that that governor is represented in this House to-day by a son, also one time governor of that great State, our genial friend and colleague [Mr. YATES].

After Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, Grant, although he had succeeded in winning a great victory, stood before the country in a worse plight than if he had been defeated, because of the attitude of those at Washington who sought to deprive him of the honors he had won on the field of battle. Gen. Halleck recommended, if you please, that the major generalship should be given, not to Grant, the victor, but to one of his subordinates. Gen. Halleck was one of those men who think they can figure out a man's efficiency and his competency according to certain psychological methods, much as we find men trying to do to-day—by efficiency charts and card-index systems. That is the sort of work that can be expected of this proposed board in analyzing the temperamental efficiency of an officer.

Now, let us pause and determine where are we at in construing this section? One gentleman says it is to eliminate, to get rid of, all officers who are inefficient. Answering him, I say that there are adequate facilities in the Army Regulations and in the Articles of War as they stand to-day to get rid of an inefficient officer.

But another member of the committee is not content with that definition—as to the purport of the section. What does he say? The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] says:

> What we want to reach here is that type of old-time or young-time officer who is manifestly by temperament and disposition and various other more or less nebulous things that go to make up his personality unfit to be in command of troops and unfit to articulate himself with the military organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Those vague, nebulous things! Very pretty, gentlemen. We are asked, then, to establish what is tantamount to a court to pass upon the vague and nebulous peculiarities which may enter into a man's disposition. What are the consequences? What is the result of a determination of that sort?

You do not send the officer to prison, you do not put stripes upon him, but you put upon him a brand harder by far to bear than that of any brand of infamy imposed by a criminal court, for you put upon him the stamp of not being a gentleman and a soldier. You shatter and destroy all of his ambitions, you thrust him out an outcast, and that, too, in times of peace!

I am willing to go as far as any man in permitting military authority to have its way in the selection of officers in time of war, when great issues are at stake, when we can not have that delicate concern for the exact rules of justice. But now we are in the piping times of peace, and why do you want now to establish a court to determine temperamental inefficiency? The thing is absurb, un-American. I do not care so much; I am not fearful of what may happen in the case of a few poor officers who are not socially up to the scale, against whom the word has been passed along that they do not dance or that their wives are not admitted to the social intercourse of the post.

Nor am I concerned so much about the fate of the other officers who will have to suffer "elimination" because of the arrogant and autocratic power you intend to put into the hands of your "high court for the trial of temperamental shortcomings." They will have at least lived out their lives without hypocrisy or sycophancy. Their fate will at least be testimony before their Maker that they have not truckled for favor.

But what about the terrorism which this bouncing board, with its unlimited powers, is likely to inspire in the minds of the younger men in the Army? What kind of fighting men do you expect to make out of moral cowards? And yet if an officer yields to the temptation to become obsequious in order to curry the favor of his commanding officer, does he not become a moral coward? I warn you, gentlemen, you are treading on dangerous ground. You are establishing a procedure which will come back to plague us a hundredfold. You are undermining the character and independence of the officers in our Army. It is the honor and the traditions of this magnificent body of men which you are about to destroy to gratify the fad-madness of a few martinets craving for more power.

[From the Army and Navy Register, Feb. 21, 1920.]

HUMILIATION AS A FACTOR IN ARMY EFFICIENCY REPORTS.

To the Editor:

"Her spirit could not brook the humiliation of endeavoring the refutation of the calumnies urged against her."

Who will dispute the force of this remark of a noted historian, whether it be applied to the high spirited of the past, of the present, or of the future?

The requirement of rendition of efficiency reports under provisions of Army Regulation 829 may be fairly condensed as follows:

By each commander respecting each officer serving under him.

The regulations, open to all, do not state the substance of the matter set forth in the body of the "form" on which the reports are made.

The earlier form (No. 187, A. G. O.) contains the following:

"Whenever an officer is marked 'not good,' or whenever any unfavorable entry or remark which affects his character is made in the report, the reason for such entry must be clearly stated, and a copy of that portion of the report will be furnished to the officer concerned, who will be granted a reasonable time to prepare such written statement in respect thereto as he may desire to make; this statement will be indorsed and forwarded with the report."

Among the 21 headings on this form is the following:

"17. Considering the possible requirements of the service, in peace and in war, would you have any objection to this officer being under your immediate command?"

So far, very good.

Seemingly, in about 1911 or 1912, the italicized requirements, inserted for protection of officers against "perversion to dishonorable purposes" (language eliminated as archaic on revision of old Articles of War, 115, courts of inquiry) of the efficiency reports, became embarrassing, and Form No. 429, A. G. O., was substituted for No. 187. From instructions on this form are quoted the following:

"Whenever any unfavorable entry of fact affecting the character of an officer is made on his efficiency report, a copy of that portion of the report will be furnished to the officer concerned," etc.

"A copy of any unfavorable entry of opinion (19 headings) will not be furnished the officer."

No reason for entry of such opinions is required, excepting in a few instances, among which is heading O, corresponding to 17, above quoted, but which in this case reads:

"O. Considering the possible requirements of the service, in peace and war, would you desire to have this officer under your immediate command? If not, state reasons. (Opinion.)"

In 1919 appears Form 706, A. G. O., Special Efficiency Report for Officers of the Regular Army. The instructions in this contain the same provision as in No. 429, forbidding the furnishing to the officer reported on a copy of "any unfavorable entry of opinion." In this form, in lieu of headings 17 and O, appears heading as follows:

"E. Considering the possible requirements of the service in peace or war, indicate your attitude toward having this officer with your command; would you (opinion)—

"(a) Especially desire to have him?

"(b) Be satisfied to have him?

"(c) Object to having him?"

Absolutely no reason required for this secretly given expression of personal desire and attitude. Attitude determined necessarily from social relations, congeniality of habits, conflicting opinions, and personal likes or dislikes, etc. Even if made aware of such desire (if unfavorable), can one conceive of a "high spirit" brooking the humiliation of endeavoring to refute such desire or opinion?

And now, under provision of section 44, Senate bill 3688, it is proposed that such secret reports shall go to a board and constitute evidence, without opportunity for hearing, on which officers may be humiliated beyond endurance by demotion to an inferior class. The efficiency of the civil service is based on the fact that tenure may not be ended by personal likes and desires of superiors.

At its best the measure carries humiliation by degrading and discrimination and, as it now stands, without knowledge on the part of the officer as to the particular respect in which he is pronounced inefficient.

No efficiency report should be permitted to reach the boards provided for in section 44 which contains secretly expressed objections to having an officer in one's command, and a proviso to such effect should be made.

It can but prejudice a board so as to prevent an unbiased consideration of other traits or qualifications, however commendable.

The purpose of the efficiency reports is the plausible one of enabling the War Department "to form a true estimate of the standing, ability, and special fitness of officers" (see Form 187), not the odious one of learning whether or not Major X would like to have him or not. These reports are passed during the year confidentially from one commanding officer to another in event of changes; and such expression of like or dislike can but prejudice the officer finally rendering the report, as it must the intervening officers in the channel, leading finally to the War Department and the general officers of the boards empowered to degrade or dismiss him, a power long withheld from the President himself, except through tribunals before which the officer concerned is summoned for a fair hearing—a court-martial or a retiring board. No such protection is provided in the establishing of the inquisitorial board by section 44 of Senate bill 3688.

X. Y. Z.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, there has been but one speech on this amendment, and I rise in opposition to it. I am opposed to the proposition of striking out the section. In my opinion this is one of the good things in the bill. It is an idea that was very thoroughly discussed by Gen. Hahn, the Chief of the War Plans Division of the War Department. He gave it, not as the opinion of the War Plans Division but as his own personal opinion, after great study. His discussion of the question is found on pages 359 and 360 of the hearings on this Army reorganization bill. Among other things, he said:

> I have finally come to the conclusion that I believe some authority in the form of elimination of the unfit, without completely kicking them out, if they are not vicious, might perhaps be the best remedy that could be applied.

And then after that followed a discussion of the subject, and he offered an amendment to the bill we had before us, as reported on pages 359 and 360, and he supported it by some very able arguments, and I think beyond question if we provide some means by which the inefficient and unfit are eliminated that we will get a higher type of leadership in our Army. I think the showing made by Gen. Hahn is very creditable and is overwhelmingly in support of this proposition in the bill as now amended, and I therefore am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 11, after the word "Board," insert "subject to the right on the part of any officer affected to a review of the finding of the board by the Secretary of War as provided in section 24 (b) to the action of the Secretary thereon."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this amendment. It will be noted that there are two boards provided, a classification board and a promotion board. Prior to the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE] and subsequently amended by the substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], there was no provision made for an appeal from the decision of the classification board. After the adoption of that amendment which provides for a review by the Secretary of War on the appeal of any officer who might be dissatisfied with the decision of the classification board, this classification list necessarily comes into the hands of the promotion board in making up the permanent list to be recommended to the President for promotion, and in order to perfect the evident intention of the committee after the adoption of the Swope and Connally amendments it seems to me that a man who might be affected, who might have his appeal pending before the Secretary of War on this classification proposition, should not be deprived of the benefit of the final action of the Secretary of War on his appeal or application for review, and the language of my amendment does not seek to nullify the action either of the classification board or the promotion board. It is offered simply for the purpose of giving those officers who might take an appeal an opportunity to have their status protected upon the final promotion list that is made up by this board provided in section 24 (c).

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama, if I understand him correctly in this. Suppose the ranking lieutenant colonel fell under the ban of this board?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The classification board?

Mr. McKENZIE. The classification board, and was put in class B?

Mr. BANKHEAD. And he takes an appeal?

Mr. McKENZIE. He would have an appeal to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of War would refer it to this appeal board as the language is now amended in this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Which appeal board does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am thinking of the Evans amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But that was rejected.

Mr. McKENZIE. Very well. Now, while that appeal is pending a vacancy existing in the grade of lieutenant colonel could not be filled, is that the gentleman's idea or his proposition, until the final determination of the case of the ranking lieutenant colonel?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; in substance that is my contention. My provision is that that lieutenant colonel, while his case is being reviewed in the hands of the Secretary of War and that decision should overrule an adverse decision of the classification board retiring him, in making up this list of promotions to be submitted to the President by the promotion board, that their recommendation should be subject in making up their list to the final decision of the Secretary of War upon that particular man's case.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think the gentleman from Alabama will agree with me that the purposes of this section are not to catch men at the top of the list—and very likely never would—but to catch men who are tailenders.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My purpose is to protect men anywhere along the line, whether they are at the top or the bottom.

Mr. McKENZIE. I doubt if——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And I hope the chairman of the committee will agree to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 6, after the word "shall," insert "within the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this section 24 (c) provides for a promotion board; and when an officer has been recommended for promotion he must come before this board for an examination of his case, and two of the board must be of the Medical Corps; and if the board should find that he is incapacitated and that such incapacity was incurred in line of duty, then he must be retired. I am sure in most cases that the finding of the board would be correct, but I think that there ought to be some discretion left in the Secretary of War about this retirement rather than to make the finding of the board arbitrary and without appeal, and it is for that reason I have offered the amendment. It seems to be in line with the other amendments which we have adopted, and leaves certain discretion to the Secretary of War.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman will find by looking over past experiences that no occasion has arisen to suggest the necessity for that. This really only reenacts existing law and a law that has obtained for decades—in fact, probably ever since a retirement list was made.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman, who, of course, is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and is more familiar with this subject than I, states that this part of section 24c is reenactment of the present law, then I shall ask to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman will find that the substance of the words, if I have a correct understanding of his intention, on page 36, line 4—if the board find the officer incapacitated for service by reason of physical disability contracted in line of duty, he shall be retired with the rank to which his seniority entitled him to be promoted—is already the policy of existing law. When the man comes up regularly for examination for promotion and is found incapacitated on physical examination, in that instance he can be put out of the active list. But at the time that he is due for promotion, if he should be retired for physical disability, he is retired at the grade he is entitled to.

Mr. BLACK. The point I had in mind, I will say, is this: Suppose the board finds he is incapacitated, and the officer does not agree with that finding, and he does not wish to be retired from the Army, under the present law has he any power to appeal to the Secretary of War?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. As to his physical disability?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes. I think the practice has always governed that. I have not in mind a specific instance, but the practice, of course, is, naturally, if a man desires to continue in the active service, to go above the examiners for a reopening of his case. But in any event, as we all know from practical experience, it depends on the judgment rendered by the medical officer. It is a question of fact determined by medical officers.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in view of the explanation of the gentleman from Vermont that this part of the section reenacts present law——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is the effect of it.

Mr. BLACK (continuing). I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the committee amendment at this time which I submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 11, after the word "Medical," insert the words "and Dental"; and in line 13, after the word "the," strike out the words "Dental and."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, we have not passed 24c yet, have we?

Mr. KAHN. No. I assumed that all amendments to the paragraph had been offered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] will withdraw his amendment temporarily. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 35, line 18, after the word "commissioned," strike out the period and insert: "Provided no officer shall be promoted over another occupying a higher grade."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, several of the members of the Military Committee stated, in establishing a list for single promotions, which is described on pages 31 and 32, that it was not the purpose of the committee to draft the bill in such a way as to permit a captain, for instance, to appear on the promotion list ahead of a major simply because the captain might have had a longer commissioned service in the Army. My amendment, offered at this place, will make it entirely clear that the committee really intends to do what it professes. Under the terms of this bill hereafter there will be one single list for promotion. My amendment is to make it clear that all the majors should appear on the list ahead of the captains. In other words, the majors should appear in their relative order according to their total commissioned service in the Army. Then the captains would follow the majors, and among themselves would rank according to their total commissioned service, and so on down the line. Unless you adopt this amendment, however, it will be possible for an officer in the Judge Advocate General's department, in the Quartermaster Corps, and in the Ordnance Corps, be he a major or lieutenant colonel, it would be possible for such an officer to be jumped on the single promotion list by captains, provided those captains had a total commissioned service longer than the major. I am sure the committee does not desire for the country to think it intends to do that. I am sure the committee wants lieutenant colonels appointed in the order in which they appear on the list and the majors in the order in which they appear. And so if you will adopt this amendment you make it absolutely positive that that is the purpose of the committee. And I ask the committee to adopt the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I ask for information. Would your amendment prevent a man in a lower rank who had performed some distinguished service being promoted over the man above him?

Mr. CONNALLY. I would say to the gentleman that that would be true except for the fact that the bill already does that in the other portions I called attention to on page 31. That page of the bill establishes a one-promotion list and provides promotions shall be made according to that list in the order in which the names appear. Now, if you are going to adopt that hard-and-fast principle, and promote officers by reason purely of their position on the list, then you ought to go further and adopt the principle that lieutenant colonels will be promoted according to their rank, and majors according to their rank, and captains according to their rank, and so on.

Mr. FESS. That sort of promotion seems to me to be antagonistic to all lines of efficiency.

Mr. CONNALLY. That may be true, and I am not taking issue with the gentleman from Ohio, but the committee has already adopted that proposition.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment of the gentleman from Texas be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be found that this so-called amendment to straighten out the single list will in its effect destroy the single list, and I would caution the House to adopt the list as the language of the bill reads, for this reason. While it is to be presumed the reclassification of officers taken into the Army since the war will mean that they will be put in grades according to their length of service, yet it also follows as a possibility that some men who may have had equivalent service to other men may be put in a lesser grade, because they are not at that time found experienced enough to hold the higher grades.

They may be found to be first-class material to start in the Army, but not to start as high as another man of the same length of service. Yet when it comes to the promotion, as I have understood the philosophy of this thing, any chance man down there who has made his ground in the meantime, and qualified and held it, will go up with the men of his own period of service as promotion goes on. Those are likely to be only exceptions for a while in the start off of the single list, because it is to be presumed that most men would not first be taken into the Army if they were found, though they had equal service with other men, not to be qualified to the same degree as the other men. There is a possibility that these men may in some instances be less available for the higher grade, so that they will be taken in at a lower grade. That was done in 1901, and done fairly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman says "will be taken in." This, of course, refers only to officers already in the service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know; but they are taken in with that understanding.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me refer the gentleman to line 9 of page 31. If what the gentleman from Vermont says is true, why does the gentleman in line 9, page 31, use this language, "without changing the present order of officers on the lineal lists of their own branches"? If you are going to vary from the single-list policy, as the gentleman suggests, you are adopting language which will tie up the War Department all the way through.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We do not do that. That upper part of the lineal list which runs from the war back is organized on the basis that the gentleman has called attention to; but further in the bill it will be found that from the war on they are taken into the Army on length of service, and even the men now in the Army are to be regulated by that.

Mr. CONNALLY. You make exception of three branches of the Army on page 32.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I must point out that if the gentleman's amendment prevails, it destroys the entire operation and philosophy of the single list, which has been worked out with great care and patience in every detail.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not generally understood that in the making up of the single list the lineal lists of the various branches of the service—Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, and so forth—shall be moved along without being disturbed, so far as it is practical to do it, otherwise we would disarrange everything?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is true. The bill itself states in very simple language, in unmistakable plainness, that back of the war itself, where the grade had become fixed and where the relations between man and man in the files of each grade had been fixed by periods of years, they are to be suffered to remain as nearly as possible as they are now. Of course, merging men from the various arms of the service into one list must mean that there must be some determination of the relative seniority of men occupying the same grade when they came in in a single list, and that is to be determined in the language of the bill without disturbing the relations of men file to file in the same arm, although they have to give place, some of them, to men of different arms as they come into the single list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But it was equally apparent that, starting with the war itself, a period now possibly less than three years for anybody involved in it, there were men coming in under all kinds of conditions and under all kinds of interpretations of law and various changes of law, none of whom, generally speaking, had ever been organized together and held the position of relative superiority or subordination, all the way down through, in length of service. They were scattered individually throughout the Army, and if the temporaries to be taken in under this act are to be allowed to compute the length of their service, after coming in under the provisions of the bill, and be assigned to grades according to that service, then it was apparent that the Regulars in the service should have the same opportunity to match them, service to service, and not be displaced by them. So that the gentleman will find that the dividing line is the beginning of the war, beginning April 6, 1917. If this amendment prevails it will upset the entire purpose and philosophy of the single list, which the Army has been trying to obtain for years and years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CONNALLY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the chairman of the committee that this promotion board is to be composed of not less than three nor more than five members, and yet I see, on page 36, a further provision which provides that the board shall have on it not less than two men who are officers in the branch of the service in which the officer is engaged, and also not less than two officers who are members of the Medical Corps. I am at a loss to understand how the board could have four members on it when the provision says it may be composed of as few in number as three, and if that provision, on page 36, lines 2, 3, and 4, is what it appears to be, it seems to me it should be modified.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will permit, I think I can explain that. It might very well happen that an officer would be in the Medical Corps, in which case the two members of the Medical Corps would be in the same line of service with him, and you would not consequently have to have this board of five men. In another case the latitude is given so that we can have five men. The idea is to have no bigger board than is necessary, but always to have a big enough board to take in the required number.

Mr. BLACK. And this is to assure that there shall be on such board two men of his own service, and that would happen if the officer were a member of the Medical Corps, even though there were only three members of the board. If he were not a member of the Medical Corps, but belonged to the infantry branch, for example, we would then need a board of five members?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. That explanation seems to be satisfactory.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 37, line 11, after the word "medical," insert the words "and dental," and in line 13, after the word "the," strike out "dental and."

Mr. KAHN. Let us have a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I am sure the chairman of the committee will agree to. It is in line with the amendment he has just offered. In line 15, after the word "reserve," the word "dental" should be stricken out, in order to conform to the amendment which he has just offered.

Mr. KAHN. The words "dental and."

Mr. DYER. In line 15, I move to strike out the words "dental and."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 37, line 15, after the word "reserve," strike out the words "dental and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. In line with the amendment just offered by the committee and the amendment offered by myself with respect to the Dental Corps, in line 15, after "officers," the word "respectively" should come out, and I move to strike out that word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 37, line 15, after the word "officers," strike out the word "respectively."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 28——

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I submit we have passed that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is in the section, but not in the paragraph.

Mr. KAHN. We agreed by unanimous consent to take up the section by paragraphs, but I will make no point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 23, after the word "section," insert "Provided, however, That any officer of the National Guard who served in the late war overseas in actual combat as colonel of a regiment shall be eligible for appointment in the grade of lieutenant colonel if he has attained the age of 43 years and is otherwise qualified."

Mr. CALDWELL. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Did we not agree by unanimous consent that we would take up this section paragraph by paragraph, and has not the paragraph been passed?

The CHAIRMAN. There was a unanimous-consent agreement that in the consideration of the section we should proceed by paragraphs.

Mr. CALDWELL. I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order, as that portion of the section has been passed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I hope the gentleman will not press that point of order. While that is technically true, yet, of course, it is the spirit of the committee to be liberal about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman does not draw the line somewhere, there will be nothing to prevent our returning to a preceding section.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This is the same section which we have been considering. There has been no other section read.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We are not going out of the section.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall not interpose any objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 3 is still under consideration, and although the committee did agree to proceed by subsections the Chair doubts whether he would be justified in ruling that the entire section is not open to amendment until it is passed and the reading of another section has been begun.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Under the provision for the appointment of men who were not in the Regular Army to the Regular Establishment under the terms of this bill, restrictions are placed upon the appointing power of the board, so that unless those officers have attained certain ages, no matter what their qualifications are, they can not be considered or appointed. Now, there were in the service men in command of National Guard regiments who were under the age of 48 years. They were men who had served in the National Guard as colonels of their regiments for years in times of peace. The country could well afford to use the services of those men in the Regular Establishment. Having held regimental command for years in the guard and similar rank and command in combat overseas, they could not accept a position under that of lieutenant colonel. Under this bill, however, the position of lieutenant colonel is not open to them if under the age of 45. Now, if this particular amendment is adopted, it will make it possible for the board to consider the appointment of men to the position of lieutenant colonel who have attained the age of 43 years and who have during the late war, in actual combat, been in command of a regiment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. Has the gentleman in mind any specific officer whom this amendment will benefit?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman know of more than one that it would fit?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. More than two?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; I have no specific knowledge of more than that number.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then the gentleman's amendment would be in the nature of special legislation for the benefit of at most two men, so far as his knowledge is concerned?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; I have general information to the effect that there were a number of guard officers who as commanders of regiments rendered the most efficient service and who would not, because of these age restrictions, be eligible.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman is basing his proposition, not upon some special matter of favoritism, but upon broad general principles, why should he limit this opportunity to those officers who were in actual combat? There may be a great many National Guard officers in this class, and it was not their fault that they did not get into actual combat.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman is absolutely correct. It was not their fault. But the best test and almost the only test of the qualities that make up a good officer is the test of actual combat. Now, there were some National Guard officers who could not get into actual combat. It was not their fault. There were others, however, who with their regiments went overseas and there in combat saw the hardest kind of service, winning the commendation and approbation of their superiors, who in almost every instance were Regulars. Yet notwithstanding this service, because of these age restrictions the board can not consider them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is a part of the melancholy experiences of the last war that many brave men almost cried their eyes out to get orders so that they could get into combat. They were penalized by not having that opportunity. Now, will the gentleman add a second penalty by excluding them from another favor which combat men can get?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is true. Many did cry their eyes out. But men who, as these men did, met the test and showed beyond question their qualifications, should be made eligible. I hope the committee will not oppose the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I should like very much to favor the very able National Guard officers who would come in under this amendment if I could do so consistently. But I do not feel that we have a right, in passing a piece of legislation such as this bill purports to be, to load it down with special legislation or with provisos and limitations or exceptions for any one or two or half a dozen more men. If we could provide a general principle upon which the Army should be reorganized, an amendment of that kind ought to get favorable consideration by this committee, but if every Member of this House has a friend that some time or other was in the Army whom he wants to favor, is going to offer amendments that the committee will approve, it will not be long until the Army reorganization bill will be more of a patchwork than any bill passed by the House.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman is mistaken; I am seeking to favor no officer; I am seeking to make available the services of officers to the country who have shown themselves to be eminently qualified.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think I have the same idea the gentleman has, but perhaps I do not express it with the nicety that he does. The fact remains that this provision would apply, so far as the gentleman's knowledge or that of any Member of the House is concerned, at the most to two men, and in my opinion that comes as close to special legislation as you can get, and makes it undesirable to put it on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That section 27 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all up to and including the third proviso, and also the proviso relating to the utilization of the service of postmasters, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 27. Enlistments: Hereafter original enlistments in the Regular Army shall be for a period of one year or of three years, at the option of the soldier, and reenlistments shall be for a period of three years."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 19, strike out all down to and including line 22 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Hereafter original enlistments or reenlistments in the Regular Army shall be for a period of one or three years at the option of the soldier. Existing laws providing for the payment of three months' pay to certain soldiers upon reenlistment are hereby repealed, and hereafter on reenlistment an allowance equal to three times the monthly pay of a private of the sixth class shall be paid to every soldier who reenlists for a period of three years.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this amendment apparently strikes out line 19.

Mr. KAHN. I want to strike out all after the word "enlistments."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all down to and including line 22——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That strikes out all of line 19, and the gentleman wants his amendment to come in after the word "enlistments."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 38, line 19, after the word "enlistments" strike out all down to and including line 22, and insert the following:

And so forth.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is that unless something of this kind is done there is no inducement for men to reenlist. Under existing law they are induced to reenlist by the provisions upon which reenlistments of soldiers shall receive three months' pay. That heretofore has been in many cases quite an inducement for men to reenlist. The amendment will not offer any inducement for one year's enlistment, but it offers an inducement for three years' enlistment. It is practically the same inducement as is given now by existing law.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I did not catch the latter part of the reading of the amendment. How much bonus does it give for reenlistment?

Mr. KAHN. Three months' pay of an enlisted man of the sixth class, which is $30 a month, or $90.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. In section 27 of the national defense act there are a number of provisos, and this section 26 repeals the first part of the language of the section which covers the term of enlistment, and then also repeals all of the section down to and including the third proviso and also repeals another proviso that comes later in the section relating to the services of postmasters in recruiting. But it leaves in the section the following language:

Provided further, That any noncommissioned officer discharged with an excellent character shall be permitted, at the expiration of three years in the active service, to reenlist in the organization from which discharged with the rank and grade held by him at the time of his discharge if he reenlists within 20 days after the date of such discharge: Provided further, That no person under the age of 18 years shall be enlisted or mustered into the military service of the United States without the written consent of his parents or guardians, provided that such minor has such parents or guardians entitled to his custody and control.

Also, another proviso following, and also a provision at the end of the section which relates to educational facilities in the Army.

Mr. SANFORD. It does not repeal the provision relating to educational facilities?

Mr. BLACK. No; but the inquiry I had in mind was that the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from California sets out section 27 by number and gives certain language which is set out in the amendment. The thought I had in mind was, Would not that form of amendment be construed as a reenactment of section 27, leaving out the matter I have just read and referred to and which it is not intended to repeal. It occurred to me that the safest method would be to reenact section 27 with the matter the gentleman has in his amendment and also the other matter that it is not intended to repeal.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I does not make any difference about the effect. So much of the amendment that is not repealed remains law.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Illinois, perhaps, can give me some information upon this subject. In line 18 it is provided:

And inserting the following in lieu thereof.

Does that refer to section 27 or to the matter stricken out?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It refers to the matter stricken out. It is amended by striking out and inserting.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think there would be no confusion arising from using the words "SEC. 27. Enlistments"? I will agree that no confusion will arise if the whole section were reenacted, but it seems to me that by setting out the section number here and giving it a subhead, and not reenacting the other——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the part that is stricken out includes the language "SEC. 27. Enlistments." That is part of that which is stricken out. Therefore it has to be reinserted.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, section 27 would not be stricken out. The word "enlistments" would take the place of the language "enlistments in the Regular Army."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; but it proposes to strike out all of the section up to and including the third proviso, and that includes the number and the caption of the section.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Illinois is so well experienced in these matters that if he thinks there will be no confusion arising I would be very glad to accept his opinion.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think there is no possible doubt about that.

Mr. SANFORD. In such form, which will be printed first, the matter here provided to be inserted——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The matter here provided to be inserted, because that comes in place of the first three provisos and includes the caption.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That section 29 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 29. Discharge on account of dependent relatives: When by reason of the death or disability of a member of the family of an enlisted man occurring after his enlistment, he may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be discharged from the service of the United States."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in line 6, page 39, the words "occurring after his," and in line 7, the word "enlistment."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, lines 6 and 7, after the word "man," strike out the words "occurring after his enlistment."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment because of a number of cases, not one or two, but a number that have been brought to my personal attention, of men who have, since the armistice was signed, enlisted in the United States Army. At the time they enlisted, being young men, being 18 years of age, they did not need the consent of their parents, but because of the enthusiasm of youth and the great love they had for the man who wears the Army uniform, they joined the Army. After getting into the Army the young man had brought to his attention, not in one instance or in half a dozen but in a great many instances, the fact that he had done a thoughtless thing, but it is almost impossible to get that man out of the Army, notwithstanding the suffering of the parent at home. In many instances there are little children involved. While the boy was at home working the parent and the children were able to get along nicely, but now they are not able to do so, and, under the rules and under the law, the officers in the Army find practically no authority to discharge the man. If we carry these words in the law, they still will be unable to find a way to discharge these men. On the other hand, if we strike out those words, and the enlisted man can make out a good case, under the discretion of the Secretary of War, he can be discharged. By reason of the fact that this discretion is lodged in the Secretary of War, no great harm can come to the Army, because, unless he makes out a good case, he will not be discharged.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman want to strike out the words "occurring after his enlistment," so that if, for example, his father died before he enlisted he may be discharged because his father is dead?

Mr. CALDWELL. That is exactly it. This is exactly the situation: In many instances the oldest child or one of the children of a widow, feeling that perhaps the family can get along, enlists in the Army, and then afterwards he wakes up to the fact that they can not get along without his aid. The gentleman must understand that this is not a grown man who has entered the Army, but merely a boy 18 years of age. The parent is entitled to a return from the services of the boy in civil life until he is 21. If the Army takes him and will not release him to the mother, the only thing that she can get is a dependency allowance and a portion of his pay.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Under the language of the section the Secretary of War would have discretion to relieve him, even if the words the gentleman desires to have stricken out are continued in the section.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think not. If the gentleman will look closely he would see that the Secretary will have discretion only in the event that death occurred before the enlistment, unless those words are stricken out of the section.

Mr. MADDEN. But suppose a man is 35 years of age when he enlists——

Mr. CALDWELL. He does not do that when he is of that age.

Mr. MADDEN. But suppose he was, and his father died before he was 20, would the mere fact that his father had died before he was 20 permit him to be discharged because his father was dead, although he enlisted at the age of 35?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think so. The Secretary of War should have discretion as to whether he should turn him loose, and we must always imagine that we will have as Secretary of War a man with some reason in his head.

Mr. McKENZIE. And that is the very point. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not in such a case as he pictured, he would want the Secretary of War to have discretion?

Do not you believe in a case of that character that the discharge ought to be imperative?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have in my files now the records of more than a dozen cases that are really pitiful, and if we add this amendment to this section the embarrassment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask for one minute more in order to finish my sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. This would relieve the Army officers of embarrassment and relieve the family of suffering. It is only human, and the thing we ought to do is to build up the confidence of the civilian population of this country in the Army, and you can not do it as long as you have hard, fast, autocratic rules of this character. We ought to have them flexible, so that human justice can be meted out wherever it is required.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That section 30 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 30. The Regular Army Reserve is hereby abolished, and all members thereof shall be discharged from the obligations under which they are serving."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do so because I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in this section you are destroying a thing that made the Hay bill one of the greatest pieces of military legislation in the history of the world, and you are putting in place of it by other sections which are to follow a voluntary enlisted reserve. For a little while it may work, because there are many men who went into the Army during the war who would be glad to enlist in the enlisted reserve or the Regular Army Reserve, or anything you want to call it, for the purpose of being able to say from a feeling of pride that he is still a member of the same unit with which he went overseas, and so you will get a reasonable reserve, but you are throwing away one of the greatest assets that the country has for its defense when you say to the man, "You come into the Army for a year or three years, as the case may be, but most of them for a year, and we will give you training, we will teach you a trade, we will teach you military science, we will make a better man out of you, but when you get through with the one year's service we will throw you back into the general body of the public and we will not have any call on you again. Whenever we get into a war the country will pass a draft statute and the chances are you will be left out." Now, my friends, if you are going to have your country defended you must have a large body of men of some kind who can be had on call who are ready organized into units——

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. In just a minute. And who are available, so that by issuing of the order of the President those men must respond and present themselves at the place designated and take up arms in defense of their country. That is the only way that you will ever have this country prepared to resist invasion. We can not feel with any degree of certainty that the next time we get into a war we will have some fifteen or twenty millions of soldiers of allied countries holding the line until we can get ready. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman recall that just before we entered the war the Hon. Augustus P. Gardner entertained the whole United States Army Reserve, numbering 16 men?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. I have no doubt that if our late colleague were here his voice would be raised in opposition to this proposition. It was by reason of the able service done by him on the floor of this House that the country was awakened to the necessity of providing a force that was to be held in readiness for the defense of our country. [Applause.] It is a sad thing that in the few short months that have elapsed since Augustus P. Gardner left these Halls members of his own party are bringing into this House a bill repealing that which he fought so many years for and accomplished in the last days of his service here. I shall always regard the speeches made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Gardner, as the ablest I have ever heard on military science, and I regret exceedingly that he is not with us now to continue the fight that he took up then and which he carried on so successfully.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman must remember that he favored a volunteer reserve also.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; he was in favor of a voluntary reserve, in favor of one-year enlistments, but at no time did he ever favor any kind of a proposition that would wipe out the enlisted reserve of the Army; he was always in favor of that. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I do not want to say anything about my own work, but I can state that I probably had as much to do with the organization of the Regular Army Reserve as any man in the House. That is a matter that I fought for in the Committee on Military Affairs when the then chairman, Mr. Hay, of Virginia, sought to increase the term of enlistment from three years to five years, and again when the national-defense act was first taken up for consideration. Finally it was written into law. When Mr. Hay, the gentleman from Virginia, was chairman of the committee we ultimately agreed to an enlistment period of four years with the colors and three years with the reserves, so that men were asked to enlist practically for seven years. Consequently enlistments fell off markedly. Then when we passed the national-defense act we fixed the enlistment period for three years with the colors and four years in the reserves. That was adopted by Congress. We had again a seven-year enlistment with only three years in the reserve——

Mr. CALDWELL. Four years in the reserve.

Mr. KAHN. I should say four years with the reserves and three years with the colors.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. There was an amendment offered that when a man showed efficiency after one year's service he could be furloughed to the reserve.

Mr. KAHN. He could be furloughed to the reserve, but would have a six-year period in the reserve.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. So that during the war we had a good many soldiers in the Army, some of them called to the colors because of their six-year furlough, some of them because of their four-year furlough, and some because of their three-year furlough to the reserve.

Now, I believe there are something like 14,000 or 15,000 soldiers of the Army who are still held in the reserves. They fought all through this war, having been called back to the colors under their contracts of enlistment. But after the war is over they are not to be given an honorable discharge, but they are put back into the reserves, and will be called upon to fight again if unfortunately this country within the next year or so should again unfurl its battle flags. Now, Mr. Chairman, while I contend the reserves were absolutely necessary until this country established a policy of selective draft, in my opinion it is not necessary since we have become committed to that policy. We can get all of these men who have served in the Army if we have to expand our forces at the beginning of a war by again enacting a conscription law. And therefore no harm is done by the repeal of the various laws regarding the Regular Army Reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. That sections 37, 38, and 39 of said act be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 37. Officers' Reserve Corps: For the purpose of providing a reserve of officers available for military service when needed, there shall be organized an Officers' Reserve Corps consisting of general officers, of sections corresponding to the various branches of the Regular Army, and of such additional sections as the President may direct. The grades in each section and the number in each grade shall be as the President may prescribe. Reserve officers shall be appointed and commissioned by the President alone, except general officers, who shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Appointment in every case shall be for a period of five years, but an appointment in force at the outbreak of war, or made in time of war, shall continue in force until six months after its termination. Any reserve officer may be discharged at any time in the discretion of the President. A reserve officer appointed during the existence of a state of war shall be entitled to discharge within six months after its termination if he makes application therefor. In time of peace, a reserve officer must, at the time of his appointment, be a citizen of the United States or the Philippine Islands, between the ages of 21 and 60 years. Any person who has been an officer of the Army may be appointed as a reserve officer in the highest grade which he held in the Army or any lower grade; no other person shall in time of peace be originally appointed as a reserve officer of Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, or Air Service in a grade above that of second lieutenant. In time of peace appointments in the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, and Air Service shall be limited to former officers of the Army, graduates of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, as provided in section 33 hereof, and persons who have attended one or more courses in schools or camps conducted under the provisions of section 33 hereof. Promotions and transfers shall be made under such rules as may be prescribed by the President, but no reserve officer shall be promoted to any grade in time of peace until he has held a commission for at least one year in the next lower grade. Nothing in this act shall operate to deprive a reserve officer of the reserve commission he now holds.

"SEC. 37a. Reserve officers on active duty: To the extent provided for from time to time by appropriations for this specific purpose, the President may order reserve officers to active duty at any time and for any period; but except in time of actual or threatened hostilities no reserve officer shall be employed on active duty for more than 15 days in any calendar year without his own consent. A reserve officer shall not be entitled to pay and allowances except when on active duty. When on active duty he shall receive the same pay and allowances as an officer of the Regular Army of the same grade and length of actual service, and mileage from his home to his first station and from his last station to his home, but shall not be entitled to retirement or retired pay."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this section proposes to amend sections 37, 38, and 39 of the national-defense act by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof; but what is inserted in lieu thereof is not an amendment to sections 38 and 39 at all, only an amendment to section 37 of the national-defense act, as I assume from the fact that the only two sections inserted are section 37 and section 37a. Probably it would not create any great amount of trouble, but this act would provide that sections 37, 38, and 39 be amended. What you do is to strike out sections 38 and 39 and not amend them.

Mr. KAHN. The sections in the national-defense act are, respectively, 38, the Officers' Reserve Corps in war, and 39, instruction of officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You are striking those out. You are not amending them.

Mr. KAHN. We are striking them out.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You are amending the act by striking them out, but you are not amending the section.

Mr. KAHN. We are striking them out and amending the act thereby and inserting in lieu of these sections the various provisions that have been read.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You are inserting certain provisions in lieu of section 37 of the national-defense act. Let me refer you to section 30, then. There you amend the act by striking out certain sections. Those sections are out if this becomes a law. Then in section 31 you say you amend sections 37, 38, and 39 by striking them out and inserting in lieu the following, but in that you are not amending sections 38 and 39. What you want to do is to strike them out.

Mr. KAHN. Probably the better form would have been in the previous section, section 30, to include those sections to be stricken out, namely, sections 38 and 39.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think it would.

Mr. KAHN. And then amend section 37. I have no objection to that and I think it would be an improvement. If there is no objection, Mr. Chairman, I ask that we return to the previous section, section 30, and strike out, in line 16, the word "and" after the figures "34"; then insert a comma after the figures "36" and add the figures "38" and "39."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to return to section 30 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 39, line 16, after the figures "34," strike out the word "and," and after the figures "36" strike out the period and insert a comma and add "38, and 39."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Now, Mr. Chairman, a further amendment: On line 17, page 39, strike out the figures "38, and 39" and the letter "s" in the word "sections" preceding the figures "37."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 39, line 17, after the word "That," strike out the word "sections" and insert in lieu thereof the word "section," and after the figures "37" strike out "38, and 39."

Mr. KAHN. And in line 18 strike out the word "are" and insert the word "is" in lieu thereof.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18 strike out the word "are" and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 41, at the end of line 10, amend by adding the following: "or to make ineligible for reappointment any person who as a reserve officer was on active duty at any time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this is that on page 40, lines 15 and 16, the provision for the appointment of reserve officers is limited by the words "between the ages of 21 and 60 years." Now, that is an original appointment. But a reserve officer who was serving during this war, and who was 56 or 57 years old when he began, and whose reserve commission may expire when he is 61, may be thought not desirable for retirement. He may be in the Judge Advocate's department, and be an efficient and useful member, and still there is a question raised as to whether he can be reappointed by that language. And this simply makes it clear that if the man's qualifications are such that he is desired, the department may reappoint him and continue to use him. Of course, if he is not desirable, they will not call him or will not reappoint him. That is the reason for the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, it seemed to the committee that 60 was a reasonable limitation on age provided for in appointments in the Reserve Corps. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] were adopted, there would be nothing to hinder the appointment of reserve officers up to the age of 100. It seems to me it would be more practicable to leave the language as it now stands.

Mr. STEVENSON. There are several limitations. In the first place, he must have been in active service during the war, and there is the other limitation that it is not obligatory on the department to appoint him. It is merely giving the department the opportunity to reappoint him on the expiration of his commission, not requiring the department to appoint him. I expect some centenarian, with all the wisdom acquired by age, might impart some wisdom even to the War Department, but I do not suppose the War Department would be making a reappointment at that advanced age, and therefore it seems to me it is merely removing what may be a doubt as to the right of the War Department to reappoint a man who served during this emergency and whose commission expires after he passes the age limit. It is not an original appointment at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to section 37.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CONNALLY. On page 40, line 18, strike out all down to the semicolon, in line 19, and insert "any grade to which he may be found to be qualified."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 40, line 18, strike out the language "in the highest grade which he held in the Army or any lower grade" and insert "any grade to which he may be found to be qualified."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not believe the committee will have any serious objection to this amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would not the language under the proposed amendment permit the President to pick out a man, say, who served as a captain in the war and make him a major general of the reserve if he wished? Would it not be allowing a promotion in the reserve by selection, a thing that we do not permit in the Regular Establishment?

Mr. CONNALLY. It may be subject to that extreme case, but the bill is just as bad the other way. I prepared this amendment very hastily, because we were about to pass this section, and I hurriedly prepared it. Under the terms of this bill, however, an officer who served in the reserve, or in the Regular Army for that matter, during the war can not be reappointed to the Reserve Corps to any higher grade than he actually occupied while he was in the service. It has been the custom of the War Department in a great many cases of officers going out of the service to commission them in the reserve as of the next higher grade to that which they held in actual service.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Take a case like this: Suppose a man had service, active service, as a major. After the war he took out a reserve commission as a colonel; he was given the grade of colonel. Now, then, in a few years or a few months we get into another war. That reserve officer is called back into the active service. Will he come back as of the grade he had experience in or of the grade of colonel?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am willing to modify my amendment, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, so that he might be commissioned not higher than the next higher grade to that which he occupied while in active service. I believe the members of the committee will recognize this proposition: By the terms of this bill practically every officer now in the Army will be promoted at least one grade, and perhaps two grades. Men who are now captains in the Regular Army, when this bill becomes a law will receive increase in rank; some of them will become lieutenant colonels, and those who do not obtain higher rank will become at least majors. But under the terms of this bill, as to the reserve officer, because he does not desire to remain in active service and goes back to private life, you restrict the War Department and say to the War Department that it shall not have discretion, and you forbid the War Department to appoint a captain who was a captain in the service and went across, perhaps, to increased rank; and you say to the War Department, "While you may take him back into the service, you shall not commission him higher than the grade of captain."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit, I suggest that it is expected, and the probable calculation is on the list, as this bill would make it up, that the promotion of captains would stop halfway down the present list, so that it is not quite accurate to say that everybody is going to get a promotion out of this in all the grades. In some grades they will only go up a number of files. After they are appointed these men may be promoted, you know.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. In many instances men who were temporary officers when the reserves were brought into the Army were recommended for promotion, and the promotions did not come because the armistice arrived. Would not the gentleman be willing to modify his amendment by inserting, in line 18, after the word "held," the words "or to which he has been recommended"?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I shall be willing to accept that.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to modify my amendment so that it will read as follows:

May be appointed as a reserve officer of the highest grade which he held in the Army, or for which he may have been recommended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Nobody can tell what it was.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas restate his proposed modification?

Mr. CONNALLY. "May be appointed as a reserve officer of the highest grade which he held in the Army, or any grade to which he was recommended while in the military service."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is that in lieu of?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is in lieu of line 18, down to the semicolon in line 19.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then the gentleman would not permit him to be appointed to any lower grade?

Mr. CONNALLY. Or any lower grade.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, line 18, after the word "or," insert the words "in any grade to which he was recommended while in the service or."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 32. That sections 40, 41, 42, 43, 45, and 46 of said act be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 40. Reserve Officers' Training Corps—Organization: The President is hereby authorized to establish and maintain in civil educational institutions a Reserve Officers' Training Corps, one or more units in number, which shall consist of a senior division organized at universities and colleges granting degrees, including State universities and those State institutions that are required to provide instruction in military tactics under the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, donating lands for the establishment of colleges where the leading object shall be practical instruction in agriculture and the mechanic arts, including military tactics, and at those essentially military schools not conferring academic degrees, specially designated by the Secretary of War as qualified, and a junior division organized at all other public and private educational institutions, and each division shall consist of units of the several arms, corps, or services in such number and such strength as the President may prescribe: Provided, That no such unit shall be established or maintained at any institution until an officer of the Regular Army shall have been detailed as professor of military science and tactics, nor until such institution shall maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students, except that in the case of the units of a corps or department the minimum number shall be 50: Provided further, That, except at State institutions described in this section, no unit shall be established or maintained in an educational institution until the authorities of the same agree to establish and maintain a two years' elective or compulsory course of military training as a minimum for its physically fit male students, which course, when entered upon by any student, shall, as regards such student, be a prerequisite for graduation unless he is relieved of this obligation by regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

"SEC. 40a. Reserve Officers' Training Corps courses: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prescribe standard courses of theoretical and practical military training for units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and no unit of such corps shall be organized or maintained at any educational institution the authorities of which fail or neglect to adopt into their curriculum the prescribed courses of military training or to devote at least an average of three hours per week per academic year to such military training, except as provided in section 50 of this act.

"SEC. 40b. Personnel for duty with Reserve Officers' Training Corps: The President is hereby authorized to detail such numbers of officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army, either active or retired, as may be necessary for duty as professors of military science and tactics, assistant professors of military science and tactics, and military instructors at educational institutions where one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained. In time of peace retired officers, retired warrant officers, or retired enlisted men shall not be detailed under the provisions of this section without their consent, and no officer on the active list shall be detailed for recruiting service or for duty at a school or college, not including schools of the service, where officers on the retired list can be secured who are competent for such duty. Hereafter retired officers below the grade of brigadier general and retired warrant officers and enlisted men shall, when on active duty, receive full active pay and allowances."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 42, line 1, after the word "that" insert "said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 42, line 1, after the word "that" insert the words "said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 42, in line 1, I move to strike out the word "of," and then, in line 2, the words "said act be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the same."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KAHN: Page 42, line 1, at the end of the line, after the figures "46," strike out the following language: "of said act be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the same."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question for information. What is the difference between schools in reference to this training? I would like to know if there is any discrimination as to the kind of colleges or schools that have this training?

Mr. KAHN. No; the War Department has formulated certain regulations which permit universities and colleges to adopt a course of military instruction under a regularly detailed Army officer. In addition, the college or university sends the students to a training camp for six weeks in the summer season, where they are trained by Regular Army officers as reserve officers of the Army. There is no discrimination made as between educational institutions, the only requirement being that they shall have a certain number of students and that they shall have a certain amount of military instruction given by certain Army officers detailed for that purpose.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is the thing I wanted to know. In our State we have a number of normal schools that heretofore have had military training, but they are not of the same standard as the State university, and I wanted to know if those schools, or institutions of that kind, where they have 400 or 500 students, and get over 100 students to take military instruction, would have an opportunity to do so?

Mr. KAHN. If they comply with the regulations of the War Department I have no doubt that they are included within the scope of the law.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to take this opportunity to commend this class of legislation. I think that this war has demonstrated beyond question the importance of trained, educated officers, and that you can train them in our schools with less friction than in any other way, and I want to compliment the committee on having made an allowance for training in the schools of the country.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to my friend from Oklahoma that many of the features of these sections were submitted to the committee by the heads of the educational institutions involved.

Mr. McKEOWN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, without objection.

Mr. DUNBAR. In answering the gentleman from Oklahoma, the gentleman from California stated that if an institution of learning in his State were to comply with the War Department regulations he had no doubt that the Secretary of War would grant their request. In the gentleman's answer there seems to be the impression created that there is no conclusive evidence that the Secretary would grant the request and that the school would have the opportunity, if it included military training in its curriculum, to have an Army officer detailed for instruction. Will the gentleman state about that?

Mr. KAHN. The language of the bill, beginning in line 9, is—including State universities and those State institutions that are required to provide instruction in military tactics under the act of Congress of July 2, 1862—which is known as the Morrill Act. Under that act the State universities received tracts of land on condition that they would teach the students military science and tactics and would establish colleges of agriculture. That appertains, however, to State universities principally, but the language goes on—and at those essentially military schools not conferring academic degrees, specially designated by the Secretary of War as qualified, and a junior division organized at all other public and private educational institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to continue for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. The purpose of the provision is to do just what I stated to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman did not answer him definitely. What I think he wanted to know, and what I want to know is, in the high schools of the cities in which there are 100 boys who would care to take military training——

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, if they were to make an application to the Secretary of War, he would detail an officer?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. I did not understand the gentleman as asserting affirmatively that the Secretary of War would do so, but that he thought the Secretary might do so.

Mr. KAHN. The law requires him to do so. He is required in high schools and schools of that class to furnish an Army officer to train the junior officers in the reserve officers' training camps. The War Department furnishes uniforms for the students; furnishes the rifles and all necessary equipment. I know that that is being done at the present time. I think this is but a repetition of the existing law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood the gentleman that the junior division could be organized in high schools and, for aught that I know, in grammar schools. Is it the intention for the Army to have enough officers to furnish instructors for the high and grammar schools in the country who may desire to be called into the junior division?

Mr. KAHN. The War Department does detail a great many noncommissioned officers and enlisted men to train the junior officers' reserve corps students. They are not all commissioned officers at these high schools; they are frequently enlisted men.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under this provision, if the people want it in a locality, they may receive military drill.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and they are taught military science and tactics.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I guess not very much; they are given military drill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 33. That said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out sections 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, and 54 and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 47. Supplies for Reserve Officers' Training Corps: The Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to issue to institutions at which one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained such public animals, transportation, arms, ammunition, supplies, tentage, equipment, and uniforms belonging to the United States as he may deem necessary, and to forage at the expense of the United States public animals so issued, to pay commutation in lieu of uniforms at a rate to be fixed annually by the Secretary of War, and to authorize such expenditures from proper Army appropriations as he may deem necessary for the efficient maintenance of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. He shall require from each institution to which property of the United States is issued a bond in the value of the property issued for the care and safe-keeping thereof, except for uniforms, expendable articles, and supplies expended in operation, maintenance, and instruction, and for its return when required.

"SEC. 47a. Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain camps for the further practical instruction of the members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, no such camps to be maintained for a longer period than six weeks in any one year, except in time of actual or threatened hositilities; to transport members of such corps to and from such camps at the expense of the United States, so far as appropriations will permit, to subsist them at the expense of the United States while traveling to and from such camps and while remaining therein, so far as appropriations will permit, or in lieu of transporting them to and from such camps and subsisting them while en route, to pay them travel allowances at the rate of 5 cents per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the camp and for the return travel thereto, and to make the payment of travel allewances for the return journey in advance of the actual performance of the same, and to admission to military hospitals at such camps, and to furnish medical attendance and supplies; to use the troops of the permanent personnel of the Army of the United States, and such Government property as he may deem necessary, for the military training of the members of such corps while in attendance at such camps; and to prescribe regulations for the government of such camps.

"SEC. 47b. Appointment of graduates of Reserve Officers' Training Corps as reserve officers: The President alone, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to appoint as a reserve officer of the Army of the United States any graduate of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps who shall have satisfactorily completed the further training provided for in section 50 of this act, or any graduate of the junior division who shall have satisfactorily completed the courses of military training prescribed for the senior division and the further training provided for in section 50 of this act, and shall have participated in such practical instruction subsequent to graduation as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, who shall have arrived at the age of 21 years and who shall agree, under oath in writing, to serve the United States in the capacity of a reserve officer of the Army of the United States during a period of at least five years from the date of his appointment as such reserve officer, unless sooner discharged by proper authority: Provided, That no reserve officer appointed pursuant to this act shall be entitled to retirement, or to retired pay, and shall be eligible for pension only for disability incurred in line of duty in active service or while serving with the Army pursuant to provisions of this act.

"SEC. 47c. Pay and commutation of subsistence, Reserve Officers' Training Corps: When any member of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps has completed two academic years of service in that division, and has been selected for advanced training by the president of the institution and by the professor of military science and tactics, and has agreed in writing to continue in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps for the remainder of his course at the institution, devoting five hours per week to the military training prescribed by the Secretary of War, and has agreed in writing to pursue the course in camp training prescribed by the Secretary of War, he may be furnished at the expense of the United States commutation of subsistence at such rate, not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War, during the remainder of his service in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, not exceeding two years: Provided, That any medical student may be admitted to a Medical Corps unit of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps for a course of training at the rate of 90 hours of instruction per annum for the four collegiate years, and if at the end of two years of such training he has been selected by the professor of military science and tactics and the head of the institution for advanced training, and has agreed in writing to continue in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps for the remainder of his course at the institution, and has agreed in writing to pursue the course in camp training prescribed by the Secretary of War, he may be furnished, at the expense of the United States, with commutation of subsistence at such rate not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War, during the remainder of his service in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, not exceeding two years: Provided further, That members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, or other persons authorized by the Secretary of War to attend advanced course camps, shall be paid for attendance at such camps at the rate prescribed for privates of the Regular Army.

"SEC. 47d. Citizens' training camps: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain, upon military reservations or elsewhere, schools or camps for the military instruction and training, with a view to their appointment as reserve officers, of such warrant officers, enlisted men, and civilians as may be selected upon their own application; to use for the purpose of maintaining said camps and imparting military instruction and training thereat, such arms, ammunition, accouterments, equipments, tentage, field equipage, and transportation belonging to the United States as he may deem necessary; to furnish at the expense of the United States uniforms, subsistence, transportation by the most usual and direct route within such limits as to territory as the Secretary of War may prescribe, or in lieu of furnishing such transportation and subsistence to pay them travel allowances at the rate of 5 cents per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the camp, and for the return travel thereto, and to make the payment of travel allowances for the return journey in advance of the actual performance of the same, and medical attendance and supplies to persons receiving instruction at said camps during the period of their attendance thereat, to authorize such expenditures, from proper Army appropriations, as he may deem necessary for water, fuel, light, temporary structures, not including quarters for officers nor barracks for men, screening, and damages resulting from field exercises, and other expenses incidental to the maintenance of said camps, and the theoretical winter instruction in connection therewith; and to sell to persons receiving instructions at said camps, for cash and at cost price, plus 10 per cent, quartermaster and ordnance property, the amount of such property sold to any one person to be limited to that which is required for his proper equipment. All moneys arising from such sales shall remain available throughout the fiscal year following that in which the sales are made, for the purpose of that appropriation from which the property sold was authorized to be supplied at the time for the sale. The Secretary of War is authorized further to prescribe the courses of theoretical and practical instruction to be pursued by persons attending the camps authorized by this section; to fix the periods during which such camps shall be maintained; to prescribe rules and regulations for the government thereof; and to employ thereat officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army in such numbers and upon such duties as he may designate."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer two committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 48, line 4, after the word "medical," insert a comma and the words "dental or veterinary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 48, line 5, after the word "medical," insert a comma and the words "dental or veterinary."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do it for the purpose of asking permission to extend my remarks by placing in the RECORD certain proposed amendments and a short memorandum explaining these amendments, so that it will go into the RECORD for the information of Members.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman already has that privilege.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. I want it to go into the RECORD of to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The proposed amendments referred to by Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri are as follows:

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO H. R. 12775.

(Union Calendar No. 220.)

The proposed amendments are intended to amend certain sections of the defense act left unchanged by this bill and to make changes in the amendments proposed by the bill. The sections of the bill are followed in order, and where new amendments to the defense act are proposed such new sections in the bill are designated by adding a letter to the numerical designations of the sections.

SEC. 35–A. Insert a new section following section 35, amending section 62 of the defense act by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof, so that such section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 62. The number of enlisted men of the National Guard to be organized under this act within one year from June 30, 1920, shall be for each State in the proportion of 200 such men for each Senator and Representative in Congress from such State, and a number to be determined by the President for each Territory and the District of Columbia, and shall be increased each year thereafter in the proportion of not less than 50 per cent until a total peace strength of not less than 800 enlisted men for each Senator and Representative in Congress shall have been reached: Provided, That in States which have but one Representative in Congress such increase shall be at the discretion of the President: Provided further, That this shall not be construed to prevent any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia from organizing the full number of troops required under this section in less time than is specified in this section, or from maintaining existing organizations if they shall conform to such rules and regulations regarding organization, strength, and armament as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any State with but one Representative in Congress from organizing one or more regiments of troops, with such auxiliary troops as the President may prescribe; such organizations and members of such organizations to receive all the benefits accruing under this act under the conditions set forth herein: Provided further, That the word Territory as used in this act and in all laws relating to the land militia and National Guard shall include and apply to Hawaii, Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Canal Zone, and the militia of the Canal Zone shall be organized under such rules and regulations, not in conflict with the provisions of this act, as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That the National Guard Reserve shall be counted as a part of the National Guard in determining the strength of the same: And provided further, That in case any State shall fail to organize and maintain the number of troops required by this section the President shall have the power to allot the unorganized quota of such State to another State or Territory desiring to organize troops in excess of its quota."

Memorandum: This extends the time for compliance as to strength one year. The present law requires an initial strength of 200 for each Member of Congress on June 30, 1920. At present only two States, Minnesota and Texas, meet this requirement.

The amendment further counts the National Guard Reserve for purposes of determining this strength, which is thought proper inasmuch as such reserve is available for call into Federal service as provided in another amendment. It further provides that where a State fails to raise its allotment of troops its unorganized quota may be assigned to another State. This is to meet a situation which will exist where some States are better able to maintain a large force than others, and the effect of this amendment will be to give the Federal Government the advantage of the maximum strength desired and yet not impose a special hardship on any particular State where conditions make it difficult to maintain a strong guard.

SEC. 35–B. Insert a new section striking out section 65 of the defense act.

Memorandum: It is thought that in view of the number of experienced officers now available for National Guard duty, this provision is no longer necessary. Division and brigade commanders will have had experience in the World War and will have no difficulty in finding qualified officers for duty as chief of staff. At the time this section was enacted National Guard officers had not had, as a rule, great experience in the field, and the real purpose was to give the division and brigade commander the benefit of the experience of a Regular officer.

SEC. 35–C. Insert a new section amending section 67 of the defense act by striking out the same and inserting in lieu thereof the following, so that said section will read:

"SEC. 67. A sum of money shall be appropriated annually, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the National Guard, including the expense of encampments, maneuvers, outdoor target practice, and other field instruction; for the hire of animals for the use of National Guard units, together with forage for the same; for the hire of competent help to care for matériel and equipment purchased or issued under the provisions of this act; for the hire of hostlers to care for public animals issued under the provisions of this act, and for forage and veterinary service and supplies for the same; for the purchase, maintenance, equipment, and rental of target ranges, camp and maneuver grounds, including the hire of caretakers and other expense of maintenance of the same; for indoor shooting ranges; for the pay and expenses of the State property and disbursing officer; and for such other purposes necessary for the support, training, and maintenance of the National Guard of the several States as the Secretary of War, upon the recommendation of the chief of the National Guard division, shall deem necessary. The appropriation provided for in this section shall be apportioned among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia in direct ratio to the number of enlisted men in the active service in the National Guard of such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia on the 30th day of June of each year.

"The governor of each State and Territory and the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia shall appoint, designate, or detail, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, the adjutant general of the State, or an officer of the National Guard of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, who shall be regarded as property and disbursing officer of the United States for such State or Territory. He shall receipt and account for all funds and property belonging to the United States issued to the National Guard of his State, Territory, or District, and shall make such returns and reports concerning the same as may be required by the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War is authorized, on the requisition of the governor of the State or Territory or the commanding general of the District of Columbia, to pay to the property and disbursing officer thereof so much of its allotment out of the annual appropriation for the support of the National Guard, or any other funds appropriated for any of the purposes of this act, as shall be necessary for the purposes enumerated herein. He shall render, through the War Department, such accounts of Federal funds intrusted to him for disbursement as may be required by the Treasury Department. Before entering upon the performance of his duty as property and disbursing officer he shall give a good and sufficient bond to the United States, the amount thereof to be determined by the Secretary of War, for the faithful performance of his duties and for the safe-keeping and proper disposition of the Federal funds and property intrusted to his care. He shall receive the same pay and allowances as an officer of the Regular Army of like grade and prior service, and such compensation shall be a charge against the allotment of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia. Such property and disbursing officer, when traveling in the performance of his official duties, shall be reimbursed for his actual necessary traveling expenses, and such expense shall be a charge against the allotment of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia. The Secretary of War shall cause an inspection of the accounts and records of the property and disbursing officer to be made by an inspector designated by him at least once each year."

Memorandum: This simplifies the present law and makes possible the payment of certain necessary expenses not covered in the present law. A great many target ranges have been acquired in the several States from funds appropriated for the promotion of rifle practice. At present a caretaker paid from Federal funds is provided, but there is no provision whereby additional civilian labor may be permanently employed to assist the caretaker in his duties. On large ranges this is necessary, and such provision would result in better service, would be in the interest of economy, and assist in the preservation of public property. The inspector-instructor appointed by the Federal Government in some of the States has recommended this. The amendment would permit the acquirement, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, of camp and maneuver grounds in addition to rifle ranges. Few of the States have suitable camp grounds. This amendment would not only make possible the acquirement of such camp grounds, but would provide for their upkeep.

This amendment omits the expenses of the Militia Bureau, which it is thought should be paid from a special appropriation made for that express purpose, and the pay of Regular officers and enlisted men detailed to the National Guard, which it is thought should be paid from a special appropriation or other funds appropriated for the support of the Army.

The duties of the State property and disbursing officer are more clearly set out, and his compensation is definitely fixed at the pay of his grade. The property accountability of State property and disbursing officers is now so great and their duties so exacting it is thought they should be entitled to the pay of their grade, which in most cases is that of a major.

SEC. 39. Strike out the amendment proposed in this bill and substitute therefor the following, so that section 72 of the defense act shall read as follows:

"SEC. 72. An enlisted man discharged from service in the National Guard, except when drafted into the military service of the United States under the provisions of section 111 of this act, shall receive a discharge in writing in such form and with such classification as is or shall be prescribed for the Regular Army. When not in the actual service of the United States, enlisted men may be discharged by the governor of the State or Territory, and in the District of Columbia by the President, for the following reasons: Expiration of period of enlistment; removal from the State; physical disability; to accept a commission; to enlist in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps; and sentence of a court-martial: Provided, however, That the governor of the State or Territory in which the soldier resides, and, in the case of the District of Columbia, the President, shall have power in any case where the removal of the soldier from the station of the organization in which he is enlisted makes it impossible for him to attend drills, or where since his enlistment he has engaged in business such as precludes him from properly performing his military duty, to transfer such soldier to the reserve: Provided, however, That the governor of such State or Territory, and, in the case of the District of Columbia, the President, shall have power to reassign such soldier to the active list at any time."

Memorandum: Under the present law discharges are granted under regulations prescribed by the President, and may be varied from time to time. Naturally a young man contemplating enlisting in the National Guard desires to know definitely the circumstances under which he might leave the service before the termination of his enlistment, and he hesitates to assume the obligation in the enlistment contract without such information, and this stands in the way of recruiting. The grounds upon which the soldier may be discharged absolutely are the same as those now prescribed in regulations. In addition thereto it is provided that the governor may place a soldier in the reserve in cases where change of residence or occupation make it impossible for him to attend drills, and he may be placed on the active list again at any time the governor may so decide. Under the present law a man changing his residence could be discharged by the President, but this would take him permanently out of the service, and he may be a desirable man with some military experience.

SEC. 40–A. Insert a new section amending section 75 of the defense act by striking out the same and substituting therefor the following, so that said section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 75. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any person hereafter appointed an officer of the National Guard unless he first shall have successfully passed such tests as to his physical, moral, and professional fitness as the President shall prescribe. The examination to determine such qualifications for commission shall be conducted by a board of three commissioned officers appointed by the Secretary of War from the Regular Army or the National Guard, or both: Provided, That an officer who has served for three months in the field in the drafted National Guard, the National Army, or the United States Army subsequent to April 6, 1917, and who was honorably discharged therefrom shall be commissioned in a grade not to exceed that he held in such service, without examination other than a physical examination."

Memorandum: This will make eligible for commission without other than a physical examination all officers who served for three months in the field during the war with Germany. It is thought that such service qualifies the applicant for such commission when appointed by the State authorities.

SEC. 40–B. Insert a new section amending section 76 of the defense act by striking out the same and substituting therefor the following:

"SEC. 76. All vacancies occurring in any grade of commissioned officers in any organization in the military service of the United States and composed of persons drafted from the National Guard under the provision of this act shall be filled by the President by the appointment of persons similarly taken from said Guard, and in the manner prescribed by law for filling similar vacancies occurring in the volunteer forces."

Memorandum: The words "as far as practicable" are omitted from the original act. The presence of these words permits the law to be ignored. It is thought that all vacancies in the National Guard in Federal service should be filled by the appointment of National Guardsmen.

SEC. 41. Amend this section of the bill by striking out the same and substituting therefor the following, so that section 78 of the defense act will read as follows:

"SEC. 78. There shall be in each State a National Guard Reserve to consist of such officers and enlisted men as may be assigned to, enlisted, or commissioned therein. Any person physically qualified, who served as a commissioned officer in the armed forces of the United States subsequent to April 6, 1917, and who was honorably discharged therefrom shall be eligible to appointment as a commissioned officer in the National Guard Reserve with a rank not greater than that he held in such Federal force. Officers in the National Guard Reserve may be placed on active duty at any time by either State or Federal authority, and while so serving shall have the same status and receive the same pay, transportation, and allowances as officers of like grade on the active list. The oath to be taken and subscribed to by officers appointed in the National Guard Reserve shall be as follows:

"I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of ——— against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the governor of the State of ———; that I make this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge my duties as an officer in the National Guard Reserve of the United States and of the State of ——— according to law.

"Any physically qualified person under the age of 45 years who served in the armed forces of the United States subsequent to April 6, 1917, and who was honorably discharged therefrom, or who has served for three years in the National Guard, shall be eligible for enlistment in the National Guard Reserve. Enlistments shall be for a period of three years, either in the reserve generally or as a reservist in any unit in the National Guard of the State. Except as otherwise provided in this act, enlisted men in the reserve shall not be required to perform any military duty while the National Guard is not in actual active Federal service, other than to report for muster at the annual inspection of the unit to which assigned as a reservist: Provided, however, That such reservist may voluntarily, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, participate in any drill service, encampment, or other military exercise, including target practice, of the unit to which attached as a reservist, and shall while so participating be entitled to the same pay, allowances, transportation, and subsistence as active members of the National Guard.

"When the National Guard is called into the active service of the United States or drafted into Federal service under the provisions of this act, the President may call or draft such reservists with and as part of the unit or units so called or drafted.

"Persons enlisting in the National Guard Reserve shall be required to take the following oath:

"I do hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted this — day of ———, 192—, in the National Guard Reserve of the United States and the State of ———, for the period of three years under the conditions prescribed by law, unless sooner discharged by proper authority; and I do solemnly swear that, as a member of such National Guard Reserve, I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America and to the State of ———, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever, and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the governor of the State of ———, and of the officers appointed over me according to law and the Rules and Articles of War as applied to said reserve."

Memorandum: The language of this section as amended will permit the enlistment of those who served during the war with Germany and are willing to answer a Federal call in an emergency, but who do not care to obligate themselves to attend routine drills, etc. These are veteran soldiers, and hence should not be required to undergo the training required of the active National Guard. They are required to report at the annual inspection, and may elect to go on the active list, participate in encampments, etc. Included also in such reserve will be National Guardsmen who, after enlistment in a unit, have so changed their residence or occupation as to be no longer available for active duty. This will give the Federal Government the advantage of a very large trained reserve which would not otherwise be available.

SEC. 42. Amend this section of the bill by striking out section 79 of the defense act and substituting therefor the following, so that said section will read:

"SEC. 79. When it shall be necessary to increase the strength of any National Guard unit called into the service of the United States as such, or drafted into Federal service as provided in this act, recruits for the same shall be enlisted or assigned thereto from the State or Territory from which such troops are called or drafted and from the locality in such State or Territory from which such troops came. The right to recruit such National Guard units so called or drafted by voluntary enlistments therein shall not be denied, nor shall the right of any citizen of a State or Territory drafted into Federal service to be assigned to a National Guard unit of his State or Territory be denied, provided the National Guard of such State is below the required maximum war strength at the time."

Memorandum: When the National Guard is called into Federal service and not drafted, as was the case when the State troops were sent to the border in 1916, provision should be made for recruiting the same from the home station of the organization. The reasons for this are obvious.

When the unit is drafted into Federal service under the provisions of section 111, and it becomes necessary to increase their strength, either by enlistment or through the draft, they should be permitted to increase their strength either by voluntary enlistment or by assigning thereto drafted men from the State and locality from which the unit comes. The advantage of localization of the units is now generally recognized. Drafted men naturally prefer to serve with troops of their own State, and as far as possible with units which come from their homes. This tends to build up the esprit de corps, and is highly desirable from every standpoint.

SEC. 43. Amend this section of the bill by striking out the same and insert the following, so that section 81 of the defense act as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 81. The National Guard Division of the War Department is hereby established. Such division shall be under the direct supervision of the Secretary of War and shall not form a part of any other division, bureau, office, or other organization of the War Department. The chief of the same shall report direct to the Secretary of War and shall be responsible only to the Secretary of War. The National Guard Division shall consist of one chief of the National Guard Division and such officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army and the National Guard as the President may direct. The chief of the National Guard Division shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate from among officers of the National Guard who have had ten or more years' commissioned service in the National Guard, at least five of which has been in the line. He shall hold office for four years unless sooner removed and shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major general of the Regular Army during his tenure of office, but shall not be entitled to retirement or retired pay. Details of officers to the National Guard Division by the President shall be upon the recommendation of the chief of the Militia Bureau. One-half of the officers detailed to the National Guard Division shall be selected from the officers of the National Guard who have served therein for not less than one year subsequent to June 3, 1916. No retired officer and no officer with a rank exceeding that of colonel shall be detailed to the National Guard Division. National Guard officers detailed under this section shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of officers of the Regular Army of like grade and service. The National Guard Division under the supervision of the Secretary of War shall have charge and supervision of all National Guard affairs. The chief of such division shall have charge of the organization, supply, and instruction of the National Guard of the several States, and shall submit estimates for the necessary appropriations to provide for the equipment and maintenance of the same."

Memorandum: The amendment proposed in the bill wipes out the defense-act provision for a Militia Bureau and leaves the office without any status at all. It provides for the appointment of a National Guardsman as chief of the Militia Bureau and the detail of regular officers thereto, and would amount, in the final analysis, to nothing more than giving some National Guardsman the rank and pay of a major general. The Militia Bureau should have a fixed status and certain and definite functions. Members of the National Guard contend that it should be a separate bureau functioning directly under the Secretary of War and not through the Chief of Staff. They feel that it should be composed in part of National Guardsmen who are familiar with National Guard conditions. They believe that the Chief of the Militia Bureau should be free to formulate policies for the increased efficiency of the National Guard, and that militia affairs should be administered by the Militia Bureau without interference from other organizations in the War Department. The Secretary of War is, of course, in supreme charge, but the Chief of the Militia Bureau should be free to take matters up with him direct. Both the Wadsworth bill and the pending measure provide that the chief of the bureau or division shall be a National Guardsman, and this is seemingly the consensus of opinion in both House and Senate committees. The Senate bill provides for a personnel composed in equal parts of officers of the Regular Establishment and civilians, and obviously the Chief of the Militia Bureau should have the assistance of officers from both services.

This clause of the bill provides for the appointment of 500 civilians for training purposes, etc. Without discussing the advisability of creating this number of civilian officers, the relevancy of such provision to this section of the law is not seen. Such 500 additional officers have nothing whatever to do with the Militia Bureau, and it would seem that legislation of this character should be offered in a separate section to the end that the two propositions may be separately considered.

SEC. 43–A. Insert a new section striking out section 83 of the defense act and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 83. The Secretary of War is hereby directed to procure and issue from time to time to the National Guard, upon the request of the governors of the several States, Territories, and the commanding general of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, such number and type of arms, with all accessories, Infantry equipment, Field Artillery matériel and equipment, Coast Artillery matériel and equipment, Signal Corps matériel and equipment, Aviation Service matériel and equipment, tank and motor truck matériel and equipment, sanitary troop matériel and equipment, accouterments, uniforms, clothing equipment, equipage, camp equipage, transportation, motor trucks and cars, horses, mules, forage, military publications, and all other kinds and classes of arms, uniforms, equipment, military stores, and supplies now or hereafter issued to the Army of the United States, as shall be necessary to arm, uniform, and equip the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia for field service; and to provide in the several States and Territories for the use of the National Guard thereof target ranges, camp and maneuver grounds, and to properly equip the same. And a sum of money shall be appropriated annually, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of securing by purchase or manufacture and delivery all such stores and supplies, and for the acquisition, construction, and equipment of such target ranges, camp and maneuver grounds. Such appropriation shall be in addition to and to supplement the appropriation made in that section of the appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, reading as follows: 'The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue from stores now on hand and purchased for the United States Army such articles of clothing and equipment matériel as may be needed by the National Guard organized by the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916. This issue shall be made without charge against militia appropriations and shall be reimbursed in kind for all Federal property brought into service by State troops.' The annual appropriations made under this section and all provision for arming and equipping the National Guard and for target ranges, camp and maneuver grounds made under this section shall be in addition to the annual appropriation made for the support of the National Guard provided for under section 67 of this act, and any other appropriation authorized or provided under any other section of this act."

Memorandum: This revises the present law and makes its administration more definite and certain. There are a number of sections in the defense act making provision for the supply and maintenance of the National Guard which are to some extent somewhat inconsistent with each other. It is thought that all of the appropriation and supply sections of the act should be rewritten and harmonized. In the amendments of this nature proposed to this and other sections in the present law the powers of the Secretary of War, in so far as the items of expense which he is authorized to meet in his discretion, are broadened.

SEC. 47. Amend by striking out the same and substituting therefor the following, so that section 110 of the defense act will read as follows:

"SEC. 110. Each enlisted man belonging to an organization of the National Guard shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the initial monthly pay of his grade in the Regular Army for each drill ordered for his organization where he is officially present and in which he participates for not less than one and one-half hours, not exceeding five in any one calendar month: Provided, That no enlisted man shall receive any pay under the provisions of this section for any month in which he shall have attended less than 60 per cent of the drills or other exercises prescribed for his organization: Provided further, That the proviso contained in section 92 of this act shall not operate to prevent the payment of enlisted men actually present at any duly ordered drill or other exercise: And provided further, That periods of any actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed (except those periods of service for which members of the National Guard may become lawfully entitled to the same pay as officers and enlisted men of the corresponding grades in the Regular Army) may be accepted as service in lieu of such drills when so provided by the Secretary of War. Payments for services rendered under sections 109 and 110 shall be made during the month following that in which such compensation was earned, upon pay rolls prepared and authenticated in the manner prescribed by the Secretary of War. All amounts appropriated for the purpose of the two preceding sections shall be disbursed and accounted for by the officers and agents of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army or by the State property and disbursing officer as the Secretary of War may direct. The Secretary of War may in his discretion cause to be deposited such sum as may be necessary to pay the troops of a State, Territory, or District under this section with the State property and disbursing officer who shall disburse and account for the same under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War. Stoppages may be made against the compensation payable to any officer or enlisted man hereunder to cover the cost of public property lost, damaged, or destroyed by and chargeable to such officer or enlisted man."

Memorandum: The provisions of this amendment is to provide for prompt payment. The incentive which drill pay gives is lost in large part if payments are long deferred. It is thought that this will add greatly to this feature of the law, which will not be burdensome on the supply departments of the Army because provision is made for pay of the troops by the State property and disbursing officer if the Secretary of War so desires. Payment of troops attending camps of instruction is at present made by the State property and disbursing officer from funds allotted by the War Department, and it is thought that monthly payments can be handled in the same way.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KING: Page 48, line 20, after the word "years," insert: "Provided further, That any reserve officer who is also a medical, dental, or veterinary student, may be admitted to such Medical, Dental, or Veterinary Corps unit for such training, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I have shown this amendment to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California, and such other members as I have been able to reach, and there seems to be a disposition to let it be attached to the bill. It simply permits those who are reserve officers to have the benefit of the same medical education that is given students of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 50, line 22, after the end of the line, insert the following:

"SEC. 47e. Military training of citizens: Beginning with fiscal year 1923, the Secretary of War is directed to provide for the military and vocational training of persons hereinafter designated, who shall be inducted into the Army for this purpose, and shall not be counted as a part of the enlisted strength of the Regular Army. The period of training shall be four months, with such additional time as may be necessary for enrollment, mobilization, and demobilization, and may, with the consent of the individual, be extended for a further period of not exceeding two months. Persons undergoing training shall receive transportation, clothing, laundry, shelter, subsistence, and medical attendance, and pay at the rate of $5 a month.

"Beginning with the fiscal year 1923, an annual registration shall be made of all male citizens of the United States, who during the calendar year of registration will attain the age of 19 years and who reside within the continental limits of the United States, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone, with the exception of persons on active duty in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. In order to carry out the provisions of this section relative to registration and induction, so much of the provisions of the act of May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" as may be necessary and appropriate are hereby extended and made applicable for this purpose. The President shall make regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this section and shall fix the compensation of members of local and district boards and their necessary employees.

"There shall annually be inducted into the Army for training, first, persons between the ages of 17 and 21 years who have had no service in the Army or training under the provisions of this section who are physically qualified for enlistment in the Regular Army and who enlist voluntarily for training; second, all persons registered in that year, with the exception of those mentally, morally, or physically incapable of profiting by such training, those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exemption advisable, as may be prescribed by regulations, and members of the Army reserve; third, all persons registered in the next preceding calendar year who were exempted from training under the provisions of this section and in whose case the cause for exemption has ceased to exist.

"There is hereby created a commission which shall consist of three Senators, to be designated by the President of the Senate, three Members of the House of Representatives, to be designated by the Speaker, and three persons, to be designated by the President, who shall prepare a complete project for a system of universal military training, including an estimate of the entire cost thereof and shall submit its report to Congress not later than January 1, 1921. The sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated for clerical assistance and other necessary expenses of said commission, to be expended upon the certificate of its chairman."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is not germane. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that while this bill on its face says that it is an amendment to the act of June 3, 1916, yet it is generally understood and by its four corners is known to be an Army reorganization bill. We are providing generally for the Nation's defense. In the bill we have sought to amend many sections of the national-defense act, and the whole scheme of amendment from beginning to end of the bill is for the purpose of revamping the Hay bill, or the national-defense act, as it is called, in such a way as to make room for the training of the young men of the country. It provides necessary officers for that purpose. It provides the necessary organization for that purpose. Nowhere in the bill has there been any particular change from the general scheme laid out by the committee, and the committee actually voted into this bill a provision upon the subject covered by this amendment. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact particularly that for the purpose of preparing for the training of the young men of our country the enlisted reserve of the Nation has been abolished, and that this amendment provides for a reserve of the young men who are trained annually to take their place. In addition to that, the bill particularly provides for the citizens' training camp, and this is just another system of citizens' training camps. The title of the section itself, at least of the amendment, reads "for military training of citizens," and then specifically carries out a scheme of the training of the citizens of certain ages. The section preceding this, section 47d—and this is to be numbered 47e—is for citizens' training camps. I respectfully submit that this proposed amendment is germane, because without it the bill is not a complete Army reorganization, and without it there are many things that are left in the air. For instance, we provide in the bill for officers for nine divisions, and then, in addition to that, an enormous number of officers that could only be used for this purpose, and that they were put into the bill for the purpose. So that all through the bill from beginning to end this is the proposition that has been in the minds of the scriveners of the bill, and the bill was carefully drawn to make place for the identical matter here proposed. With the exception of the words "all citizens" and the figures "$10,000," the proposition I make is in the exact words of the amendment proposed by Mr. KAHN, the chairman of the committee, when the question of universal training was first broached.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Is it true that this is an amendment to the national-defense act and provides for the training at these citizen training camps?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; and "for other purposes."

Mr. BLACK. But is it not true that that training is purely voluntary, and is it not true that under the amendment that the gentleman has offered he has a compulsory registration?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think a compulsory registration, followed by a compulsory training would be germane to a provision in the bill that provides for only voluntary training?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will explain to the gentleman. It is true that the citizens training camp mentioned in section 47d is a voluntary training, but it is also true that this bill provides a system of enlistment in the United States Army. It provides for the training of the United States Army. It provides for the training of the citizenship, and abolishes the enlisted reserve.

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. For no reason in the world except to make room for a compulsory system of training of the young men to take the places of these others.

Mr. BLACK. But is not the whole theory of the bill bottomed upon voluntary enlistment of men in the Army?

Mr. CALDWELL. While all of the enlistments specified in the bill are voluntary enlistments, quite the contrary is true so far as the basis of the bill is concerned, because the bill was drawn by the committee with a view of making a place for this, and consequently it is germane.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I am not an expert when it comes to arguing points of order. To my mind, however, the amendment is entirely and clearly subject to a point of order in the manner in which I view it. The whole bill under consideration is based on voluntary service in the Military Establishment of our country. The amendment of the gentleman from New York provides for the inauguration of the compulsory system of conscription in time of peace for military training. In my judgment it is clearly subject to a point of order, but I am rather hopeful that the clearer and broader vision of the gentleman who now occupies the chair will see proper to hold this amendment in order. As far as I am personally concerned, I am ready now to meet it.

There is one other point I want to call to the attention of the Chair. Does it necessarily follow in parliamentary law that when a matter is inserted in a bill which, to be effective, connects with another, therefore it follows that you must include the other matter? This committee a few days ago took action for the creation of a separate construction corps, providing for 250 officers and 8,000 enlisted men, and any man in this House who knows anything about the Military Establishment knows that there is absolutely no use for any such a corps unless we are to follow it up by calling into camps by compulsory conscription in time of peace six or seven hundred thousand of the boys of this country in order to give them military training. For one, I hope the Chair will hold this in order, that we may be consistent, and if we are headed straight for a program putting this whole Nation under military training and discipline, let us go down the line and be consistent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The general point has been made, and the only point of order against the proposed amendment is, that it is not germane to the bill or to this particular section of the bill. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois and of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the title of this bill is—

To amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes."

The Military Committee certainly has general jurisdiction to bring in legislation of any sort that in its wisdom it sees fit to provide for the national defense.

But I fail to see the logic of the proposition that simply because there is the involuntary method of training of civilians as opposed to the provision here where it is voluntarily, that that necessarily makes the proposed amendment not germane either to the jurisdiction of the committee to consider it or to the subject matter of the section which we are considering. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will not discuss that phase of the point of order?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I would simply say to my friend from Alabama I am not an expert on parliamentary law, but I understand it to be one of the rules of parliamentary procedure that where you have two things of the same character in a proposition you can add a third, but where you have only one you can not add a second, and, therefore, under this bill we are pursuing one policy and we can not add to that a second and different policy.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is not there a distinction in this matter that these boys who are to be trained under this bill are not part of the Army and do not become a part of the Army; and would not these boys under this bill become a part of the Army by reason of the compulsory nature of the amendment offered?

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield one moment? Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I am with the gentleman from Illinois and I would rather prefer to see this question voted on and meet it at once. On this side—that is, the Democratic side—we are, I am sure, against compulsory military training, and there would be about nine out of ten who would vote against it. Can the gentleman say about how many on his side [laughter] would vote against it?

Mr. McKENZIE. I can not say; but under the circumstances I think it would be unanimous. I would like to ask the gentlemen if he is not too careful in his estimate?

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in support of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, the foreign matter which the gentleman from New York is endeavoring to inject into this bill at this time can not under any rules of this House be considered germane or in order, so what is the use of this House wasting its time? We have been on this bill more than one week. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] that they have put in here a reorganization scheme for a construction corps that this House ought to turn down when it comes to a question of a vote in the House, and I will vote to cut it out, just like I voted to prevent its going in; but the Chair now has to rule whether or not this foreign substance, this irrelevant, contemptible matter [laughter] of universal compulsory military service shall be engrafted into this pregnant bill. The Chair must rule according to the precedents and according to sense. If he rules it is to go in, according to the gentleman from Illinois, in a broad sense, irrespective and regardless of common horse sense and the rules of this House, where will we land? So far as I am concerned, I have fought this universal compulsory military service ever since the day it was born. I have fought it in committee and I have fought it on the floor of the House every time its ugly head appeared in sight.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. QUIN. I will yield.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is not this proposition that is involved in the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] the same identical proposition introduced before the committee by the Republican chairman of the committee [Mr. KAHN]?

Mr. QUIN. Yes; but it has been eliminated.

Mr. KITCHIN. I just wanted to know.

Mr. QUIN. That was ended in the committee, but I think perhaps that the sentiment of the two gentlemen is the same on that question. But I do not know whether or not the gentleman from New York and my friend from California have the same exact ideas on it. One wants to go out and get all the boys and put them under compulsory training and then place them in what is called a "reserve army."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentlemen are not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will confine themselves to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. QUIN. I thought that was all germane to the point of order, if the Chair pleases.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman just permit an interruption for just a minute?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I insist that gentlemen shall confine themselves to the question before the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is it in order for the gentleman from North Carolina to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] if his proposition is the identical proposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not see that that has any bearing on the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I just wanted to know.

Mr. QUIN. I did not yield the floor for that purpose. It is the point of order that I am endeavoring to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. QUIN. I do not care whether this is the same child delivered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] or not. [Laughter.] The contempt I have is for the offspring itself, it is not for its parents. I respect the parents of this child. [Laughter.] But this illegitimate child has been presented here to be made a part of the household regardless of parliamentary regularity or legislative respectability.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. QUIN. This is very germane to the point of order, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to ask the gentleman from Mississippi to confine himself to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. QUIN. Is the Chair ready to rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. QUIN. I thank the Chair and I will not speak further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] offers an amendment providing for universal compulsory military training. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The Chair is not called upon to decide as to the merits or demerits of this amendment or of the proposition it embodies. The principal contention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is to the effect that this entire bill was constructed with reference to placing this very amendment at this point in the bill, and argues from this fact that it should be in order to introduce the same amendment here. It seems to the Chair immaterial whether the bill was so constructed or not, because it is well established that a committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter may include in a bill any number of provisions properly within the jurisdiction of the committee which, if offered by a Member from the floor of the House, even by a member of the committee or by the committee itself, could not be inserted by way of amendment, unless germane to the bill which the committee has brought in.

The question to be ruled upon is one of germaneness under the much-quoted seventh clause of Rule XVI of the House rules, that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

One of the most noted and, in the judgment of the Chair, one of the best-considered rulings on this point was made just 40 years ago by Mr. Carlisle as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole before he was Speaker of the House. It is quoted at some length in V Hinds' Precedents, section 5825. Mr. Hinds in the syllabus prepared by him, before quoting from this ruling, states the point of it applicable here as follows:

> While a committee may report a bill embracing different subjects it is not in order during the consideration in the House to introduce a new subject by way of amendment.

Mr. Carlisle proceeds to a very able and thorough review of the entire matter, bringing it down from the time of the Congress under the Articles of Confederation to 1822, when the rule in its present form was adopted. In one sentence this able parliamentarian makes clear the point now raised by the gentleman from New York:

> The rule does not prohibit a committee reporting a bill from embracing in it as many different subjects as it may choose; but after the bill has been reported to the House no different subject can be introduced into it by amendment, whether as a substitute or otherwise.

The question is, Does the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York introduce, under color of amendment, a differest subject from that under consideration in the bill? The bill proposes to amend the national defense act and does amend it in a number of its sections. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is offered as section 47e of the national defense act. Is the amendment of the gentleman from New York germane to any provision of the national defense act? A thorough examination of that act in this connection would seem to require a negative answer. In the opinion of the Chair this amendment introduces a subject different from that under consideration in the bill, and is therefore in contravention of Rule XVI of the rules of the House. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Would the Chair hold that this would be in order under the miscellaneous provisions of the bill on the last page?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not attempt to cross the bridge until he reaches it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will ask the reporter, as soon as he makes a copy of it, to bring it back, so that I can offer it then.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 48, line 4, after the word "Medical," insert "and Dental," and in line——

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, that has already been adopted.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 34. That said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out sections 55 and 56 and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 55. The Enlisted Reserve Corps: The Enlisted Reserve Corps shall consist of persons voluntarily enlisted in the Enlisted Reserve Corps for periods of three years. Voluntary enlistments shall be limited to persons eligible for enlistment in the Regular Army who have had such military service or training as may be prescribed by regulations of the Secretary of War. All enlistments in force at the outbreak of the war, or entered into during its continuation, whether in the Regular Army or the Enlisted Reserve Corps, shall continue in force until six months after its termination.

"SEC. 55a. Organization of the Enlisted Reserve Corps: The President may form any or all members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps into tactical organizations similar to those of the Regular Army and similarly armed, uniformed, and equipped, may officer them by the assignment of reserve officers or officers of the Regular Army, active or retired, and may detail such personnel of the Army as may be necessary for the administration of such organizations and the care of Government property issued to them.

"SEC. 55b. Reservists on active duty: Members of the Enlisted Reserve Corps may be placed on active duty, as individuals or organizations, in the discretion of the President, but except in time of actual or threatened hostilities no reservist shall be ordered to active duty in excess of the number permissible under appropriations made for this specific purpose, nor for a longer period than 15 days in any one calendar year without his own consent. While on active duty they shall receive the same pay and allowances as other enlisted men of like grades and length of service.

"SEC. 55c. Military equipment and instructors at other schools and colleges: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to issue such arms, tentage, and equipment as he shall deem necessary for proper military training to schools and colleges, other than those provided for in section 40 of this act, having a course of military training prescribed by the Secretary of War and having not less than 100 physically fit male students above the age of 14 years; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail such available active or retired officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Regular Army as he may deem necessary to said schools and colleges, other than those provided for in section 45 of this act: Provided, That while so detailed they shall receive active pay and allowances: Provided further, That in time of peace retired officers, warrant officers, or enlisted men shall not be detailed under the provisions of this section without their consent."

Mr. DENT and Mr. JONES of Texas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. DENT. To move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I promised several days ago to place in the RECORD a statement of the expense of the Army as proposed substantially in this bill, together with universal training. I shall not undertake to give to the committee a detailed statement of them. The report gives an itemized statement of the cost of the officers per annum, the cost of the enlisted men per annum, the cost of the officers of the National Guard, the cost of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the cost of compulsory military training per capita, and the cost of reserve officers. It shows that if the bill should be adopted with compulsory military training, as provided in the Senate bill, that you can not get along without an annual appropriation of something over $900,000,000 per annum. It may run up as high as $1,000,000,000 per annum, depending on the character of construction work for the training camps for the young men.

The details of this bill are figured out by an officer of the Army who has long been accustomed to make estimates of this kind. I do not believe that anybody can be accurate in estimating what universal compulsory military training will cost the Government. You can only estimate that it will cost $5 per month per capita for the number of young men that may be sent to the training camps. That number has been variously estimated at from 600,000 to 750,000. The proposed plan for universal compulsory military training provides for a compensation to the young men of $5 per month. I wish to submit to the House this suggestion, that if you start upon this plan with $5 per month, it is only a question of time when you will have to pay them at least the lowest pay of a private soldier, which is $30 a month. It will be only a question of time when the parents of these young men will come to Congress and insist that there must be a family allowance for dependent relatives, as you have now provided by law under the draft. So I say, when you take into consideration the overhead charges, the maintenance of the Regular Establishment, the National Guard, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and training camps, if you adopt a system of compulsory military training, you will have to start out at the very beginning with an annual expense of something like $1,000,000,000. That is simply the beginning, and no man knows where it will end.

Now, these details I have submitted here, I repeat, were prepared by an officer of the Army who has long been familiar with making estimates for Army appropriation bills. It goes into every specific detail as to how he reaches, for instance, the conclusion that it will cost $328.19 per capita to train the young men of the country. I submit it to the House for what it is worth. I believe it to be valuable information.

The following is the statement:

18,000 officers, at $3,600 per annum	$64,800,000
280,000 enlisted men, at $1,381.66	386,867,600
100,000 National Guard, at $315.08	31,508,000
5,600 officers, National Guard, at $1,000	5,600,000
20,000 Reserve Officers' Training Corps, at $251.31	5,026,200
80,000 Reserve Officers' Training Corps, at $78.51	6,280,800
750,000 training, at $328.19	246,142,500
37,500 reserve officers, at $1,000	37,500,000
20 per cent increase of Infantry	98,971,000
	882,696,100
If cantonments are used under the bill, at least 24 division cantonments will be required. Estimating the cost per cantonment at $5,000,000, we have an original investment of $120,000,000. Cost of maintenance and upkeep of cantonments will be 6 per cent of the original cost or	7,200,000
As division cantonments are not available in number sufficient to meet the needs of 24 divisions in 12 corps areas, there is no doubt but that steps will be necessary to provide the required cantonments, and at least 15 will have to be constructed, which will require the first year	75,000,000
Damages to crops, etc., due to maneuvers, are estimated at $6 per capita of the total strength	6,780,000
Total	971,676,100
If tentage is used the cost each year would be four-fifths of the original cost of the tentage, as the life of a tent under favorable circumstances is five months. The original cost of tentage for the reservists as above at $20.05 per capita is $15,037,500, four-fifths of which is	12,030,000
Assuming the use of tentage and not cantonments, the cost would be, deducting the cost of cantonments	894,726,100
Damages to crops, etc., as above	6,780,000
Total	901,506,100

To this can be added the cost of employees, equipment, maintenance, etc., of the administrative or bureau offices in Washington, which will approximate $15,000,000 a year.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman name the officer?

Mr. DENT. I should prefer not to do it on account of the officer, but if the gentleman insists I will do so. I will state to the gentleman that the officer is an officer with whom he has long been familiar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. The War Department has sent me a letter signed by the Assistant Chief of Staff, showing what the cost of universal military training will be, and I wish to insert that letter in the RECORD. But the statement that has been made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is very illuminating at this time.

The Committee on Military Affairs decided to take up the question of universal compulsory military training as a separate measure. One of the distinct objects of doing that was to thrash out the very fact that we ought to have accurate information as to the actual cost of the system. It was in order to get those facts that a majority of the committee finally decided, after mature deliberation, to postpone action at this time in order that a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs could be appointed, could have full hearings on the subject, in order to secure all possible data that might be helpful in the consideration of the subject. If the Committee on Military Affairs finally agree upon a bill upon that subject they would come to the House fully fortified to defend that bill from every angle. I will not, therefore, at this time take up the matter for discussion, but hope to consider the question at some length when it comes up in a proper manner before the House.

I simply want to state that I will insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the letter from the War Department showing that universal training under the Senate bill will cost, as I remember it, approximately $130,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to insert the letter referred to.

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, January 16, 1920.

Memorandum for Col. T. W. Hammond, General Staff.
Subject: Cost of universal training.

I. In reference to your verbal request submitted to the office of Director of Operations (Col. Hickman) in regard to the estimated cost of training 100,000 young men for a period of four months under any universal-training scheme that might be adopted by Congress you are advised that this matter has been carefully gone into and a computation made which shows that, assuming the rate of pay is $5 a month, that such training would cost the Government approximately $26,162,218.

II. This figure, while including the ordinary expenses incident to the upkeep and training of soldiers, such as pay, subsistence, cost of laundry, medical attention, etc., also includes an estimate as follows:

For family allowances at the rate of $30 per month	$1,200,000
Expenses of local boards of not less than three members, to pay not exceeding $10 a day for services and reimbursement expenses	553,500
Clerical help, office rent, and maintenance	384,375
Appeal boards, pay the same rate as local boards	45,000
Clerical help in connection with appeal boards	31,250
Total	2,214,125

III. If it is not desired to include such items in connection with the estimate that you want, their elimination is an easy matter by simply deducting the above total from the amount stated in the first paragraph. This would indicate that approximately $23,950,051 would be needed to provide for this training when the ordinary expenses of the soldier are taken into consideration.

HENRY JERVEY,
Major General, United States Army,
Assistant Chief of Staff, Director of Operations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. In the statement that the gentleman has filed is there any estimate as to pensions?

Mr. KAHN. No. It is simply a letter from the War Department, signed by the Assistant Chief of Staff, Gen. Jervey, showing what the cost of universal training will be under the Senate provision.

Mr. CANNON. If they are held in the military service for training under our policies they are eligible for pensions and some compensation for injuries, and so forth, and so on.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, under the system proposed by the majority of the committee they are never in the Army of the United States. They are just taken to the camps for training, but they are not members of the Army.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed for just a few minutes, perhaps not exactly in order. The matter of compulsory universal military training has been referred to, and there are a few words that at this time I should like to say upon that subject.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the question of cost, the question of compensation to the young men of the country while they are forced from their homes into the training camps, the question of pensions to them in after years, all these questions of cost that go with military service—because this policy, if adopted, will be military service—are worthy of the serious and earnest consideration of the Congress before it determines to embark upon that policy.

But, sir, to my mind that is not so important as another phase of the question. There are deeper things than this involved. I refer to the psychological situation as applied to the ideals of this Republic. That which I think most important, Mr. Chairman, in connection with compulsory universal military training is not so much its cost, not the question of the benefits that are to be derived by the young men from the physical training that they will receive, for there is no room for argument as to that. The danger which I fear is that a system of universal compulsory military service will absolutely change for all time to come the spirit of this Republic. [Applause.]

It has been the history, Mr. Chairman, of every great nation that has existed in all the tides of time which entered upon compulsory military training that that nation had become in time a nation imbued not with the ideals of justice but with the thought of conquest. It was so in Greece; it was so in Rome. It has been so in all the great nations that have sprung up which adopted this policy of universal compulsory military training. I fear, if this Nation shall enter upon it, what is more important than cost, what is more important than any inconvenience, what is more important than any interference with the industrial life of the Nation—I fear that it would absolutely change the spirit of the people of our Republic.

Oh, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States provides that the Congress may declare and must declare war if we have it. And yet, sir, in our reading of the history of our own country we know, indeed, that it is easily practicable for the Executive of the Nation, who deals with international affairs, to take such a course as that the Congress is compelled, in sustaining the national honor, to declare war. We have not had Presidents of the United States, fortunately, who were in love with war as war. I think we have had no President who really desired war. All of those of us who sit here know out of our own experience and our own personal observation that President McKinley resisted, so long as it was possible at all, the efforts to declare war upon Spain. I mean so long as he could do so and preserve the national honor. We know that the present President of the United States exhausted every means within his power to preserve our peace before he recommended to Congress the declaration of war against Germany. Our Presidents have not been men who thirsted for war.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I had hoped to finish the reading of the bill before the committee rises this evening. How long does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. GARRETT. Only two or three minutes, if it is agreeable to the gentleman. I recognize that I am not proceeding in order, and will quit now if the gentleman desires.

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection to two or three minutes longer, certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. But, Mr. Chairman, to continue the line of thought I was trying to express, we do not know who are to be the Presidents of this Republic in the future. We do not know with what spirit they will be imbued. We do not know what will be the spirit of the people of this Republic. Who is there who believes, for instance, that Germany would have ever precipitated the great World War whose effects are to be felt for a hundred years if she had not had that system of compulsory military training which imbued her people with the military spirit? If we could have this training without having the military spirit, if we could have the power with the absolute certainty that there would not be constantly some one or some group itching to use it, perhaps it might be well. But before we enter upon that policy we should at least reread history and try to learn the lessons that it teaches. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARRISON. After line 23 I want to insert an independent paragraph.

Mr. KAHN. On what page?

Mr. HARRISON. On the same page that we are talking about.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We can not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRISON: On page 52, after line 23, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Enlistments for six months for military training may be accepted of young men 18 years old under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HARRISON. For military training.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let the Clerk report that amendment again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman mean voluntary enlistments?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas reserves a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment is in order. It simply provides for the military training of young men on their voluntary enlistment. The other proposition was ruled out because it was for compulsory military training.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman care to discuss the point of order?

Mr. HARRISON. I wish the gentleman would reserve the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish simply to say that if there is any benefit to be derived from military training for the young men of the country, I do not see why we should not afford them the opportunity to receive that benefit. It certainly could do the country no harm, and if it does the young men good it seems to me that would be the proper solution of this difficulty, to allow an opportunity to train the young men who desire voluntarily to submit to the training. This would be a substitute for compulsory training.

Mr. KEARNS. Would the gentleman's amendment require a separate organization or branch of the Army to train these young men?

Mr. HARRISON. Under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. KEARNS. They would be no part of this army of 300,000 men.

Mr. HARRISON. No; it is voluntary enlistment for purposes of training.

Mr. McKENZIE. If we adopt the gentleman's proposition, does he think we would get any voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army?

Mr. HARRISON. This is for young men 18 years of age, to be trained six months, and is a substitute for the compulsory military training by making it voluntary.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under the gentleman's amendment would these young men who voluntarily enlist be entitled to draw pay?

Mr. HARRISON. No; it would be simply an enlistment under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War. They would be taken for military training under such rules and regulations.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman's amendment says "enlistment."

Mr. HARRISON. One is for service in the Army and the other for military training.

Mr. KEARNS. Under the gentleman's amendment, would the Secretary of War have the right to fix their pay?

Mr. HARRISON. No; there would be no pay attached to it.

Mr. KEARNS. The amendment does not say so.

Mr. HARRISON. Unless pay is provided, there will be no pay. My proposition is simply to furnish the young men of this country the opportunity to be trained if they desire to be.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane either to the section to which it is offered or to the main subject matter of the bill. I presume that the Chair is ready to rule on that. It involves the same proposition as the amendment of the gentleman from New York. This section is for the detail of instructors to schools and colleges.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is for military equipment and instruction.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not adding it to that section.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman offered it to that section.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman offered it to that section. And even if that were not true, you would have a new class of enlisted men in the United States Army for military training. In other words, the question of training is a separate and distinct one from the question of the reorganization of your Regular Establishment and from the provisions reported by the committee. I think it is plainly not in order.

Mr. HARRISON. This is intended to be a separate paragraph.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit, it can not be an independent paragraph. It has to be a part of a section of the bill. If the gentleman wants to offer it as an amendment to the pending section, then he can offer it as section 55d.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I will offer it as section 55d. I want to get within the rule. My idea was that it was an amendment to section 34 and not an amendment to section 55c.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman would have to differentiate it from section 55c.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. I renew the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. As to the point of order that the gentleman from Arkansas makes——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. HARRISON. All I desire to call attention to is that the paragraph is after the one with reference to military training. This is simply a new opportunity for those who come forward to be trained.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this is the identical principle involved in the ruling of the Chair on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL]. The Committee on Military Affairs has a right to report and inject into a bill as many subjects as it chooses with reference to the military status, but this is a new subject and is for the training of the civilian population. The gentleman from Virginia states that which I think is wrong, that they do not become enlisted men. He says they are enlisted for a special purpose. If they are not enlisted it is a special class of service, and he seeks to insert into the Military Establishment that which does not now exist—a new subject and a new class.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the section contains four so-called subsections. One relates to the enlisted reserve corps. Certainly this amendment would not be germane to any provision of that section. The next relates to organization of the enlisted reserve corps, and certainly this amendment would not be germane to that section. The third subsection relates to the reservist on active duty. Certainly this amendment would not be in any way germane to that subsection. The fourth subsection relates to the furnishing of military equipment and the detail of officers to schools, and nothing else. I do not see anything in the section that is pending which relates in any way to military training, except where it provides the furnishing of equipment and officers for certain schools.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me that section 55 relates to enlistments in the reserve corps, and this would seem to be closely allied to that subject and the organization of the reserve corps.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. These are not reservists.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Virginia if he intends by his amendment that these young men of 18 years shall be a part of the Army?

Mr. HARRISON. No; except for military training purposes only.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not provided that they shall become a part of the Army at all?

Mr. HARRISON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, as a separate vote will undoubtedly be demanded on the amendment which creates a separate construction corps in the Army it is my intention to insert in the RECORD some further facts and figures showing the confusion and extra cost it will entail, and I hope the Members of the House will take occasion to read them.

Also at this time I want to call the attention of the House to statements that have been published in the newspapers in reference to the discussion of bonus matters, to the effect that Members of the House who served in the Army during the war drew salaries both as Members of the House and as officers or enlisted men in the Army.

In order that the country may know the facts I asked the Sergeant at Arms of the House in regard thereto, and he advises me that the Members of the House who served in the Army are divided into three classes: Three declined to draw any pay from the Army and were paid their full congressional salaries while absent from the House; one drew his Army pay and his congressional salary as well, the Army pay, as provided by House resolution, being deducted from his congressional salary; two Members drew their Army pay and refused to accept their congressional salary after the passage of the House resolution. [Applause.]

The matter referred to by Mr. ANTHONY is as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON EFFECT OF SEPARATING SERVICES FROM THE QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

Under the organization of a separate construction corps, which it is contemplated to perpetuate in House bill 12775 and Senate bill 3792, all utilities are operated by this organization. This means that all repairs for maintenance at posts, depots, and other plants, and all machinery and plants utilized thereat, shall be operated by the construction corps.

The heating and lighting plants and mechanical labor-saving devices at supply depots will be operated by officers who are not under the jurisdiction of the responsible commander of the plant. This creates a condition similar to a superintendent of a mill who is deprived of jurisdiction over the engineer of his plant, who could dictate the kinds of machinery that were installed and methods and hours of operation, despite the fact that the superintendent is responsible for the output of the factory. Where will the responsibility for quality, quantity, and economical production be placed? What will be the result of post or camp maintenance being placed under a utilities officer operating under the construction corps? Not only will there have to be an additional officer at each camp or post to carry on this activity and in charge of repairs, of heating, lighting, water, and garbage disposal maintenance, but each utility officer will have to have a duplicate office personnel to the post supply officer from whom he will draw the tools and materials to carry on his work. At present the supplies he uses are drawn from purchase and storage, despite the fact that purchase and storage is not responsible for maintenance of such supplies. When purchase and storage supplies become exhausted, then construction must set up a storage service parallel to that of purchase and storage in order to provide maintenance from stock and not require emergency repairs to await the legal and routine delays necessary in Government purchases.

Maintenance has heretofore been an additional activity pertaining to the supply officer, who as post quartermaster formerly performed all the functions of supply, transportation, finance, and construction. Post maintenance placed under his jurisdiction requires no additional officer or clerical personnel, and the supplies necessary are carried under a storage system which is already at his disposition. When the two are divorced we not only set up an additional and totally unnecessary personnel, but we create delays and inefficiency through divided responsibility and the complications of routine. The added financial burden is most apparent.

If Congress still deems it necessary to create a separate construction corps, the utilities functions should be divorced from "new construction" and maintenance at posts assigned to the Quartermaster Corps. Utilities functions other than those at posts and camps should be assigned to whatever bureau is charged with the activity. Thus giving to the Ordnance Department and the Quartermaster Corps complete jurisdiction over their manufacturing plants and control of labor-saving devices in the handling of supplies pertaining to the activities of their responsibilites.

If a separate construction corps is to be created it is most important that the following amendment should be adopted in the definition of the duties thereof, viz:

"Except utilities pertaining to the maintenance of posts, camps, and stations, which shall be assigned to the Quartermaster Corps, and maintenance and utilities at depots, arsenals, and manufacturing plants, which shall be charged to the service conducting the activity."

Section 9, H. R. 12775, provides 1,050 officers for the operation of the Quartermaster Corps, with transportation and construction included. With construction a part of the Quartermaster Corps, but 47 of these officers would be engaged on such work, as follows:

In the office of the Quartermaster General:
Brigadier general		1
Colonels		2
Majors		4
Captains		6
Total		13
For the field:
Majors	10
Captains	24
Total		34
Grand total		47

No special number of officers was contemplated for the so-called utilities duties at posts, camps, and depots, as one of the number of officers assigned by the Quartermaster Corps to each station would be required to perform the duties pertaining to utilities in addition to such other duties as would be assigned. At some of the larger places the full time of the officer assigned to utilities duties will be required, but such cases do not involve an increase of the total commissioned force provided for by the Quartermaster Corps.

For purely construction purposes it would be necessary to provide a group of officers for duty solely as constructing quartermasters during the periods construction is in progress. When there is no construction these officers would be available for other duties.

The apportionment of officers by the General Staff on October 31, 1919, gave 290 officers to the construction division. Unless Congress contemplates vast construction projects for the Army the 47 officers provided in the total of 1,050 for the Quartermaster Corps will be ample to carry on the normal activities pertaining to new construction during peace times.

Under paragraph 2, General Order 131, War Department, December 8, 1919, the construction division (utilities officer) is charged with—

Installation, operation, and repair of all plants; construction, repair, and maintenance of all buildings; installation, repair, and operation of all fire apparatus; construction, repair of all railway tracks, fences, roads, drainage, culverts, bridges, signals, and procurement of all materials in connection therewith.

This creates a condition in the maintenance of Army posts and depots which is extravagant and inefficient. It will necessitate a duplicate storage system at each post and station and duplicate depots for replenishment, in view of the fact that the supply and transportation officers each use many similar articles to those used by the utilities officers. For instance, the quartermaster could not mix his stock of nails, tools, etc., with those of the utilities officer, as the funds covering procurement come from different appropriations. The utilities officer would not trust his stock in the same storehouse as the quartermaster, and the quartermaster vice versa. This will also necessitate two sets of storekeepers and the necessary clerical help entering therein.

Should a quartermaster warehouse suddenly spring a leak, or should the manufacturing plant at the Philadelphia or Jeffersonville depots break down, the process of manufacture will cease until the utilities officer makes the necessary repairs. Assuming that the utilities officer had not foreseen this possible condition and did not have the necessary parts in stock, production would cease until they had been received. If the roof springs a leak, the quartermaster is responsible for the damage to his stock pending repairs by the utilities officer, and yet the quartermaster has no authority to see that the utilities officer is prepared for or competent to meet such an emergency.

The quartermaster is in charge of manufacture and must be selected for his competence for this supervision, and yet his decision to install a new or improve an old mechanical operation in an endeavor to obtain economical and efficient production is completely subject to the determination of a separate service which might, through inefficiency or intent, wreck an efficient organization or prevent the proper development or improvement of an inefficient one.

Divorcing the several services, such as finance, construction, transportation, etc., from the Quartermaster Corps, where they properly belong, simply consumes excessive public funds, in that it creates duplication of officers and enlisted men and the necessary clerical personnel, labor, and supplies. With all this added expense, it actually retards instead of speeds up the fundamental reason why all the services exist, viz. the supply, pay, housing, and transportation of troops.

As an example, take a military post. With finance, construction, and transportation a component part of the Quartermaster Corps, one officer (the quartermaster) did all the work with one office force, one set of records, and the minimum of supplies. He usually had a sergeant in charge of the several divisions under his direct supervision, where all could be coordinated and worked into an efficient, smooth-running machine. With divided services, an officer of each service will necessarily be required in each post. Each of these will require a separate office (expense fuel, light); a separate set of records (expense forms, stationery); a separate set of personnel (expense), all of whom will be busy part of a day but idle the greater part (useless expense). With a quartermaster performing all of these duties, we have a minimum force constantly employed, flexible and available as a whole to absorb the peak load at any time falling upon any activity, with no unnecessary administrative heads, and lacking all the routine delays and red tape of intercommunication between separate services.

Approximate comparative expense at small posts and stations:

Consolidated.

1 captain, quartermaster	$2,400
2 clerks	200
4 enlisted men	200
1 office, heat, light	———
1 set records	———
	2,800

Divided.

1 captain, quartermaster	2,400
1 lieutenant, transportation	2,000
1 lieutenant, finance	2,000
1 lieutenant, construction	2,000
4 clerks	400
8 enlisted men	400
4 offices, records, etc	———
	8,800

The above is what will necessarily happen in a small post, resulting in inefficiency and cumbersome methods of supply. In addition there will be the expense to post headquarters in issuing orders for four services instead of one, which will entail an increase of approximately 50 per cent.

The expense and inefficiency in supply which will be created by separating these activities, as demonstrated in the operation of small posts, becomes an increasing factor as the size of the post increases and up through the avenues of supply, the depots, and department headquarters, and finally in a vastly magnified degree by the creation of these new bureaus in the War Department.

Each new service will demand the creation of another major general to provide for its chief, and then the expansion and competition will begin. Gradually these separate services will "justify" their existence by expansion, each requiring a little more each year for its budget. This "little more" each year, added to four or five services, soon becomes millions and millions. Vast offices filled with clerical forces, voluminous correspondence between services, and an excuse for a greatly enlarged General Staff, who will ineffectually claim to "coordinate" these separate services.

Personal ambition in these separately created services and the General Staff have created powerful machines to lobby for the continuation of their existence. Is Congress going to legislate into existence a system whereby 75 cents of every dollar appropriated for the Army will be spent in the administrative methods incurred for each 25 cents worth of supplies? What does the Army get? Only delays and insufficiency in supply.

The subchairman of the Appropriations Committee, the Bureau of Efficiency for the War Department, the Inspector General's Office, and, except for the General Staff, the Army itself, deems these separations of activities from the Quartermaster Corps are inadvisable and that they will entail inefficiency and greatly increase cost. How will Congress answer to the taxpayer?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph refers to the training of our soldiers. It is a very important subject, and I had hoped that this bill would provide for some different system of training.

In our last war we created an Army on a very different plan from any we had ever had before. Our organization was effective, but I doubt whether it was as effective as it might have been. At all events, a very unfortunate situation arose and was manifest as soon as the soldiers were discharged.

One of the most important things in organizing an army is that the method of training and discipline should be such as to strengthen the feeling of loyalty to the Government and creating an attachment between the enlisted men and their officers. It is not only important, but it is absolutely necessary, that our Army organization be such as to increase the patriotism of the men who compose the Army and their willingness to serve the Government in a military way. If, on the other hand, it tends in the other direction, our organization is, to a certain extent, a failure. Yet this is precisely what has occurred as a result of our present system, which is in no way altered by this bill.

During the Civil War and afterwards a very different condition prevailed. Although there was a far larger percentage of our population called into the service and as a consequence a greater amount of deprivation and hardship ensued, the soldiers of the Civil War came out proud of their service, attached to their officers, and ready to go in again when their country called. The enlisted men in this last war have come out, as everyone knows, with a grouch. It is attributable to nothing else than the West Point system of discipline, more rigid than that of any other country in the world except that of Germany, upon which it seems to have been, to a certain extent, modeled.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would rather the gentleman would speak in his own time.

Mr. KAHN. I simply want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that "Hard-boiled" Smith is not a West Point graduate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; but he acted under a West Point graduate in accordance with instructions of West Point graduates. He richly deserved his punishment, and yet he was acting under orders from West Point graduates who also ought to have been punished. A large portion of the court-martials and practically all of this feeling on the part of the enlisted men that they were unfairly treated and disciplined arises from this caste system that has been established at West Point and prevails throughout all our military training. No other republic or democracy has it. It does not exist in the armies of France, and the magnificent courage and splendid fighting ability which the soldiers of France displayed in the last war is an abundant demonstration that we have no need for any such system in our own Army. When I was on the other side I saw in France enlisted men riding in the same compartment on the train with general officers of the French Army. This was forbidden by our regulations. I was told by men who had the opportunity to know that they had often seen company officers of the French Army walking arm in arm with privates, and I see no reason why that should not occur. Certainly they often lunched together in the restaurants. In our Army I knew of different officers who instructed officers of lower grades that they should not address the privates as "boys" or by any term that indicated special regard for them. This was the favorite term in the Civil War. All the officers, from the commanding general down, spoke of the men as their "boys," indicating thereby the affectionate regard which they held for them. Among the French the common term by which the captain or the colonel addresses the enlisted men is "mes enfants"—literally translated, "my children"—corresponding to our term "boys." What we need in our Army is a thoroughly democratic system. [Applause.] It is not destructive of fighting power. I was told by one of our prominent staff officers in France, who not only had a great deal to do with the operation of our Army but was intimately acquainted with the operations of our allies, that the Australians were the best fighters among our allies. But, he added, they had no discipline in the ordinary sense that we speak of it.

It is a fact that some of the most brilliant and successful attacks upon the German positions were conducted by the Australian troops, who are very lax in what West Point would call discipline, particularly with reference to the salute and other matters of that kind which have no real relation to the fighting ability of an army. I would not advocate doing away with the salute, but it is not strange that our enlisted men felt aggrieved when a whole company would be disciplined because some lieutenant dashed by an outpost in an automobile going 60 miles an hour and received no salute for the very good reason that he was on and past the sentinel before there was opportunity.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not refuse to yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That almost disarms the question. The gentleman is aware that the first thing the Bolsheviki undertook to do in their country was to destroy the discipline in the army?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; but not in the way that I am talking about.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, they did away with the salute and they did away with all of those things which destroy the distinction between the private and the officer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The doing away with the salute was a small portion of what they did. What the Bolsheviki did was to hold soldier's councils and decide how the soldiers should move. In other words, they arranged that the privates should issue the orders and not the officers. Of course, no army could be effective operating under such principles and it ruined the Bolshevik army. I am not prepared to say that the Russian Army could be made effective except by an iron discipline. The privates of the Russian Army are ignorant, they are accustomed to being driven, and until the Bolsheviks came into power had never tasted of freedom. It is not strange that they became intoxicated upon the first drafts of the new spirit. I doubt very much whether the Russian people are capable of self-government, and a people that are incapable of self-government can not have a democratic army that would be effective. But we have long talked that so far as our country was concerned a different principle prevailed.

The Old World aristocracy upon which this West Point caste system was founded does not exist here. I have no patience with this snobbery that too often has existed in our Army. Nor have I any patience with that class of officers whose company records are filled with court-martial proceedings. I have had much experience in dealing with and controlling men, and an officer who has the whole United States Army at his back and is continually in trouble with his men is utterly incompetent to hold that position. It was a mistake in the last war to make officers principally upon their knowledge of drill regulations and with little regard to their capacity for leadership, as was often done. I have known of cases where a "hard-boiled" variety of officer had his men in the guardhouse half the time and accomplished nothing in the way of improvement in that essential form of discipline which constitutes willingness and promptness in obeying orders, and after that officer had been superseded by a man of real sense in a few weeks the detachment was as orderly as could be found anywhere.

Mr. Chairman, a reform of this kind is generally long coming about, but I hope it will come before we have another war. We need not only to preserve but cultivate the spirit that has animated the citizens of this country throughout the long and weary Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Civil War. We are a free people and we need none of the marks of aristocracy in our Army. The fighting spirit of the Army depends in the main upon the patriotic impulses of the enlisted men and their devotion to their country and the principles upon which its Government was founded. It may be that such a change as I have desired should come about not by direct action of Congress, but by and through the actions of the officers who control our Army. I have thought that I had seen indications of such change, and I sincerely hope, not only in the interest of our men but for the preservation of our Nation, that it may soon be accomplished.

Mr. STEAGALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to register my protest against this bill. When we entered the World War we had something like 125,000 men in our Army. The first measure brought before the House after the termination of the war provided for an Army of more than half a million men. The total cost of supporting the Army before the war was about $100,000,000 a year. The first bill reported to the House, and which we were urged to support after the armistice was signed and the world at peace, so far as actual fighting was concerned, provided for about 600,000 men, at an annual cost of more than $1,000,000,000. If we were to adopt the plans of those responsible for the bill now before us, we should enter upon a system in which the expense of the Military Establishment alone would approach, if it did not exceed, the total cost of running the entire Government prior to our entry into the war. Let us not forget that we entered the war for the purpose of destroying the military autocracy of Germany. We appealed to the moral sense of mankind to support us in the effort, and our appeal rang around the world and rallied a moral force of incalculable force. But just as soon as our efforts were crowned with success the Congress of the American people was confronted with the proposition——

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I can not yield. I have not the time.

I say, just as soon as we had destroyed German militarism, with all its crimes against the laws of God and man, we were confronted with the proposition to establish in this great, free Republic the same monstrous system which we entered the war to wipe from the face of the earth. [Applause.]

The people have incurred burdens amounting to more than $25,000,000,000 to enable us to carry on the struggle to destroy the curse that forced us into the war. They are groaning beneath a load of taxes and bonds. Before the entire cost has been met and the various plans for caring for our soldiers and their dependents can be completed billions and billions more will have to be paid. To meet and discharge these obligations and adjust their payment fairly among all classes presents one of the most serious problems that ever confronted the Nation. Such a burden would be a menace to the very existence of any nation in the world save ours. Our bonds are selling below par. Our credit is in danger of impairment.

Of course, no sane man expects that we shall be involved in war any time soon. Peace is a normal condition, and men of normal minds expect it to continue. But if the fears of the militarists prove well founded and we shall be again drawn into war, what could be more important than to have our debts paid, our credit unimpaired, and our financial system ready for the strain? Great wars in the future will be contests of resources and not altogether of man power. There could be no worse impairment of our strength in any possible contest in future than the crippling of the Nation's credit and the power to mobilize its resources.

To listen to the contentions of the militarists would lead to the conclusion that we lost the war or that the conflict is still in progress. But what are the facts? Germany has been crushed, her mighty military machine has been broken to pieces. All that is left of it are her dead, her widows and orphans, and her crippled and insane. In the darkness of her despair she stands with uplifted hands pleading for assistance. The other nations participating in the horrible conflict are scarcely through burying their millions of dead. As they go about the task of caring for their crippled and blind and insane there comes to us their appeal for food and clothing to sustain them until they can start normal life again. Staggering under a load of debts they are unable to meet, they ask us for an extension of credit and for financial aid with which to reestablish their business and their industries. Solomon said that "the borrower is slave to the lender." But we are asked to believe this great, independent Nation of more than 100,000,000 free people, with all of our vast and unrivaled resources, the creditor Nation of earth, holding the master hand in the financial affairs of the world, with 3,000 miles of ocean stretching between us and the powers of Europe, must live as abject slaves of a cowardly fear that those stricken people are ready to rise up and crush this mighty, peaceful Republic.

It is a challenge of the common sense of any man to tell him that the peace and honor of this Nation are endangered by any power in God's universe! Even if we should find foundation for fear of attack, who among us doubts that the 4,000,000 stalwart and heroic young men recently trained and who have just won such imperishable glory for American arms can not be trusted to maintain our safety? What greater aspersion could be cast on their glorious record than the demand for a big standing Army and compulsory military training at this time? What a mockery we should make of their sacrifices and the splendid ideals for which they fought were we to establish in this free land the vicious system which so recently engulfed the world in a war of unparalleled devastation and death?

For four years 25,000,000 strong men were removed from productive pursuits and their efforts turned to the destruction of life and food and property. As a result the supply of the necessaries of life has been curtailed, prices have soared beyond the reach of the poor, and even now, more than a year since the cessation of hostilities, millions and millions throughout the world are in need of food and clothing. In the face of all this we are asked to maintain an Army of 300,000 men and to take 600,000 to 800,000 of our young men and place them in military training or service for more than half the year. Those of us who helped to defeat the former bill providing for an Army of 600,000 men should take courage and keep up the fight. But for the patriotic efforts of the Members of this House who repudiated that measure, the reduction to a force of 300,000 men would never have been submitted. If we will only fight on until we secure a similar reduction in the present bill, we shall have rendered a great service to the Nation.

It is estimated that the period for training embodied in the proposed plan for compulsory training would be from six to eight months in the year. It would take one or two months to get the men to and from the camps. The measure provides for four months of training, with authority conferred upon the President to add two months. So it is safe to say that we should have from 600,000 to 800,000 men in training more than half the year. It is estimated that such a system of training would cost about $750,000,000. The Regular Army plan, as provided in the bill before us, would cost fully $500,000,000, making a total of one and a quarter billions of dollars a year to be spent on the Army. This is the plan the militarists desire to put over, and that, too, when the world is crying for a greater production of the necessaries of life and for relief from the burdens of war. This is the plan to be fastened on the people of this country when no sane man has the slightest fear that any nation on earth contemplates declaring war against us and when we have 4,000,000 of young men, freshly trained, constituting the best army the world ever saw.

I refer to the plan of compulsory military training in connection with this bill, because the two are linked together in the minds of those who have been trying since the war to force their will upon the Congress. It is proposed in the present bill to establish the first part—the other will come later. If it were not for the fact that this is election year, the plan for compulsory training would have been reported before now. The patriotic and courageous action of the Democratic caucus in serving notice that, if the present bill for compulsory military training was to be jammed through Congress at this time, the people were to be informed and enabled to fix responsibility has resulted in the defeat of that part of the program for the present. But it is proposed now to let it rest until the election is over, and, unless the people are aroused between now and the November election, a man in league with the militarists will be elected President. If that happens the entire scheme will be put over in the next Congress, if not in this.

In these perplexing conditions we are asked to take our boys from their homes and schools and our young negroes from the farms and other productive pursuits that they may swell the ranks of our Army, the maintenance of which costs so much. Just here let me say, as a man who has practical knowledge of the negro, that when he is taken from his work and given six months' military training you may take my word for it, as a rule, he will never return to his labor, unless he does so under sentence of some court. It would be no less than criminal to take the young negro men of the country in their present state of mental and moral development and remove them from useful employment for a course of military training that would develop in them an everlasting distaste for useful toil. I tremble to think of their fate if they are to be made the victims of this false and vicious system.

The world is stricken by war and sick of the burdens and expenses involved in the support of armies.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I can not yield. The people of this country are clamoring for a return to the simplicity and economy that characterized the Government before our entrance into the war. [Applause.] They fear the tendency toward centralization of power in Washington. They shrink from the burdens of militarism, which in all ages of the world has led to the oppression of the common people and the destruction of democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I can not yield. How unwise, how utterly foolish it seems, just at the time we have shown the world what a great, free, peace-loving people can accomplish, with the nations of the earth looking to us to lead them to higher and better things, to be told that we should substitute for our policy the system by which the German Empire went to its doom. When that great nation looks down into the depths of her defeat and despair, she must confess that her destruction came through her efforts to militarize the spirit of her people and to glorify war. That is the great danger that confronts us. As foolish and as unjust as it is to attempt to saddle additional debts and bonds upon the patient, patriotic people of this Nation, such considerations are trivial compared to the perversion of the ideals of the youth of our land. So long as we keep true to the faith upon which our Government was founded we need have no fear. There is nowhere under the stars any nation or combination of nations that threatens the overthrow of our institutions. If this Republic ever fails in its mission among the nations of the earth, it will be found that the forces of destruction are within and not outside our borders.

Solomon said, "He that ruleth his spirit is mightier than he that taketh a city." The supreme test before us is not our capacity to cope with any foreign foe, but our ability to solve the problems and eradicate the evils inherent in our national life. Providence has blessed us with wealth and resources unequaled in all the world. Our mountains and streams and lands have not yielded even a foretaste of what we may expect in the years to come through the development of an educated, enlightened, patriotic people. The future is roseate as a dream, if only we approach the task that awaits us in the light of the teachings of history. Great as is our wealth and resources and as important as is their conservation and development, let us not forget that moral forces constitute the Nation's greatest asset. In the future, as in the past, the spirit of our people must be our inspiration and our strength. We are face to face with the most momentous period in our history. Let us hope that the spirit of the plain people and their devotion to our democratic institutions will guide us now, as in the past, and save us from the folly of those who would lead us away from the teachings of our fathers to pattern after the monarchies of the Old World. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. I ask for three minutes more.

Mr. KAHN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 41. That section 78 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 78. That hereafter men duly qualified under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War may enlist in the National Guard Reserve for a period of one or three years, under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and on so enlisting they shall subscribe to the following enlistment contract and take the oath therein specified: 'I do hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted this — day of ———, 19—, as a soldier in the National Guard Reserve of the United States and of the State of ———, for the period of one (or three) year–, unless sooner discharged by proper authority, and I do solemnly swear that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America and to the State of ———, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever, and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and the governor of the State of ———, and of the officers appointed over me according to law and the rules and Articles of War: Provided, That members of said reserve, officers and enlisted men, when engaged in field or coast defense training with the active National Guard, shall receive the same Federal pay and allowances as those occupying like grades on the active list of said guard when likewise engaged: Provided further, That, except as otherwise specifically provided in this act, no commissioned or enlisted reservist shall receive any pay or allowances out of any appropriation made by Congress for National Guard purposes.'"

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I do this in order to call the attention of the gentleman who has just addressed you and the committee to the fact that it was a Democratic administration that sent a bill to the House and to the Senate asking for an Army of 576,000 men and universal compulsory military service; that this Committee on Military Affairs took that bill and cut out universal military training and made the Regular Army just one-half as large as your administration advocated, and yet the gentleman goes into hysterics here over this well-balanced Republican measure that saves this country from the militarism advocated by a Democratic administration. A minority report was made by at least one Democratic member of the Committee on Military Affairs saying that this bill did not create an Army large enough. It must be a good bill that splits the minority party the way this bill does.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 56, line 21, after the word "War," there should be quotation marks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 56, line 21, after the word "War," insert quotation marks.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to section 40. I rose intending to offer it before section 41 was commenced, but the Clerk had commenced to read.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that we have already passed that.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to return for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Missouri to offer an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri: Page 55, after section 74 add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 74a. That section 75 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'Provided, That an officer who has served for three months in the field in the drafted National Guard, the National Army, or the United States Army subsequent to April 6, 1917, and who was honorably discharged therefrom shall be commissioned in a grade not to exceed that held in such service without examination other than physical examination.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that it be changed to 74a. There is probably a section 75 in the national-defense act. Without objection, it will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this seeks to add as a new section of the national-defense act the words mentioned. It does seem to me that after a party has served for the length of time as stated in this proposed amendment that no mental examination ought to be required again, but only the physical examination provided in this section. And I trust the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 43. That section 81 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 81. Militia Bureau of the War Department: The Chief of the Militia Bureau shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among officers of the National Guard who have had 10 or more years' commissioned service in the National Guard, at least 5 of which has been in the line. He shall hold office for four years, unless sooner removed, and shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major general of the Regular Army during his tenure of office, but shall not be entitled to retirement or retired pay. For duty in the Militia Bureau and for the instruction of the National Guard the President shall assign such number of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army as he may deem necessary. The President may also assign, with their consent, and within the limits of the appropriations previously made for this specific purpose, not exceeding 500 officers of the National Guard to duty with the Regular Army, in addition to those attending service schools, and while so assigned they shall receive the same pay and allowances as Regular Army officers of like grades, to be paid out of the whole fund appropriated for the support of the militia."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KAHN, for the committee: Page 57, line 12, after the syllable "ment," insert: "The Militia Division of the War Department shall hereafter be known as the Militia Bureau of said department."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill how much longer he expects to run?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, we have only six more pages to read. I had hoped that we would be able to finish the reading of the bill to-day.

Mr. CALDWELL. You can not vote to-night, anyway.

Mr. KAHN. I have no desire to trespass upon the convenience of the Members of the House. We have been in session six hours.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, just for a minute. Will the gentleman from California permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. In this last amendment, just adopted, it says:

The Militia Division of the War Department shall hereafter be known as the Militia Bureau of said department.

Is that what the gentleman means, or that it shall be referred to as the "Militia Bureau"——

Mr. KAHN. "Of the War Department," it should say.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I suggest the gentleman correct that.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that the correction be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? If not, the clerk will make the change. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from California moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. VAILE, for four days, on account of the death of a friend.

To Mr. BACHARACH, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I desire to state that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] is ill and will be unable to attend upon his duties in the House for several days, and I ask unanimous consent that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Minnesota will be granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House resolution 476, a resolution which I introduced myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on House resolution 476, introduced by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. Reserving the right to object, what is it about?

Mr. KING. It concerns the investigation of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. PLATT. I thought so. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Before that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on war expenditures by inserting a brief letter which I received on that subject and a copy of my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of war expenditure. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Reserving the right to object, are they the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. A copy of a short letter to me and a copy of my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letters referred to are as follows:

OFFICE OF COLLECTOR OF THE REVENUE
FOR THE CITY OF ST. LOUIS,
ST. LOUIS, MO., March 4, 1920.

HON. CLEVELAND A. NEWTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. NEWTON: I have frequently noted from Washington dispatches statements indicating extravagance in the expenditures of the War Department. I am interested to know the real facts. You are on the ground and have an opportunity for a near view of the Government's expenditures.

If not asking too much, I wish you would write me, giving the true situation as you understand it regarding war expenditures.

Yours, very truly,

EDMOND KOELN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1920.

HON. EDMOND KOELN,
Collector City of St. Louis, St. Louis, Mo.

MY DEAR MR. KOELN: I have your letter of the 4th instant requesting near-view information regarding a subject in which every patriotic American ought to be interested. More than a year has passed since we emerged from a World War, a war in which 1,390,000 of our boys saw active service upon the battle line in Europe. Of this number 50,000 were killed in action and 236,500 wounded. In the conduct of that war our Government expended $27,500,000,000. In addition to which the Government loaned $10,000,000,000 to our Allies. During the war the people of this country, regardless of politics or creed, made every sacrifice of blood and treasure to support the administration in power in order to insure the winning of the war, and now that the party responsible for that administration is preparing to ask to again be intrusted with the reins of the Government, it is well to scrutinize the administration's war record and ascertain whether or not it has merited the continued confidence of the American people.

The phase of the administration's war record in which the public is especially interested is its unparalleled expenditures of public money. The people bought Liberty bonds and thrift stamps to the limit of their capacity. They have paid taxes in every conceivable form, and now that they have paid billions into the Nation's Treasury they are interested to know how that money was expended by the party in power, in order to determine whether that party is entitled to their continued confidence.

The Sixty-sixth Congress, soon after it convened in May of last year, appointed a committee of its Members to investigate the expenditures of the War Department. That committee has labored long and earnestly. It has examined the records of the War Department. It has interrogated many witnesses under oath. It has collected much evidence, and it is from this testimony that I have gathered the facts which I shall present in response to your letter.

The records of the War Department show that the administration expended for artillery during the World War the sum total of $1,191,182,850, and yet Gen. John J. Pershing, in his final report as commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, states that the only guns of large type produced at home, which reached France before the cessation of hostilities, were one hundred and nine 75-millimeter guns and twenty-four 8-inch howitzers, making a total of 133 American-made guns which reached our front and were in use when the armistice was signed. Our Democratic friends contend that these limited results from such an enormous expenditure of money were due to our state of unpreparedness when war was declared. Yet we remember that Belgium was invaded in 1914, three years before the declaration of war; the Lusitania was sunk in 1915, two years before the declaration of war; and the Administration now in power won the election five months before the declaration of war upon the slogan, "He kept us out of war." For three years the Administration had abundant warning that war was imminent, and if we were not prepared, then who was to blame?

The records of the War Department show that the administration expended $1,051,000,000 on aircraft, and yet Gen. Pershing in his final report says:

"In aviation we were entirely dependent upon our Allies. From time to time we obtained from the French such planes for training personnel as they could provide. Without going into a complete description of aviation material, it will be sufficient to state that it was with great difficulty that we obtained equipment even for training."

Our people are complaining about the high cost of shoes, yet when we examine the testimony taken by the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department we wonder that shoes are not to-day infinitely more expensive. At the date of the armistice we had 3,700,000 men under arms, while we had more than 100,000,000 people engaged in civil life. The testimony taken by the committee shows that to have filled the orders made by the Ordnance Branch of the War Department for leather goods for use in the Army would have required 300,000 more hides than the sum total of all the hides produced in the United States. The testimony further shows that the War Department had for use in the Army 391,000 horses and mules, and yet the records of the War Department show that the Ordnance branch of the department ordered for use upon these horses and mules 945,000 saddles and over 1,000,000 sets of double harness. The War Department purchased 1,637,197 horse brushes; 2,029,418 nose feed bags; 1,148,364 horse covers; 2,850,853 halters, which was enough to cover more than 2,000,000 horses at one time, and all of this equipment to be used on 391,000 horses. It is difficult to comprehend, in the face of these facts, how officials of the administration in power expected 100,000,000 people in civil life to procure the necessary leather for shoes.

As above stated, the War Department owned during the war 391,000 horses and mules. It was decided that these horses and mules must be branded. The testimony taken by the committee shows that in September, 1918, a representative of the War Department entered into a contract with Henry Moss & Co., of New York, for 195,000 branding irons. This was more than one branding iron for every two horses in the Army. The contract required that these irons should be made of copper, which was both scarce and expensive. The contractor purchased 79,952 pounds of copper, which was 20,000 pounds more than needed to make the irons, and officials of the company stated that they paid 39½ cents per pound therefor. The War Department paid the company 39½ cents per pound for all this copper, and then immediately sold it back to the company for 11 cents per pound. We won the war without branding the horses and mules because no branding irons had been delivered at the time the armistice was signed. But the records of the War Department show that officials of this administration compromised the claim of this company by paying them $40,000.

The testimony taken by the committee shows that in August, 1918, the War Department entered into a contract with Stein-Burn Camp and Field Equipment Co., of Chicago, for the manufacture of fireless cookers, bread boxes, and cook's chests. The company bought a large amount of black steel sheets and tin plates, which it had when the armistice was signed. The expert testimony showed that this material was reasonably worth 90 per cent of its cost price, yet the testimony shows that representatives of the War Department, in the settlement of this company's claim, allowed the company cost price for the material and sold it back as scrap iron. The testimony further shows that this company delivered to the War Department 66 fireless cookers, 25 cooks' chests, and 7 bread boxes, and the records of the War Department show that these 98 kitchen utensils cost this Government the sum total of $171,687.06, which sum the representatives of this administration paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The testimony further shows that in October, 1918, the War Department placed an order with the Briar-Hill Steel Co., of Youngstown, Ohio, for 776,600 sheets of corrugated-steel roofing, a character of steel roofing which the contractor ordinarily used in his business. None of this roofing had been delivered to the Government when the armistice was signed. The contract was canceled, and the contractor made a claim for loss of profits, and the records of the War Department show that the officers of this administration compromised the claim for $164,519.68, which they paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The testimony taken by the committee shows that the War Department entered into a contract with the Standard Steel Car Co., of Hammond, Ind., for the construction of nine hundred and sixty-four 9½-inch howitzer carriages. The War Department agreed to pay for the cost of buildings, material, and machinery, and the company was to be paid a commission upon the total cost of such carriages to the Government. The Government paid for the buildings, which cost $2,987,200, and after the armistice was signed the War Department sold these buildings back to the company for $600,000. The testimony shows that at the time the armistice was signed this company had on hand material for which the Government had paid $5,558,000, and the testimony further shows that representatives of the administration sold this material back to the company as junk for the sum of $300,000, and that, too, in the face of the fact arsenals of the United States were clamoring for material of this same character. The testimony further shows that not a single howitzer carriage had been delivered to the Government prior to the signing of the armistice, but that after the armistice was signed the Ordnance Department had the company finish 200 of these carriages, and that these 200 carriages cost the Government the sum of $18,582,428.88, which sum representatives of this administration paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The testimony further shows that in August, 1918, representatives of the War Department entered into a contract with the Jones-Laughlin Steel Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., for the manufacture of toluol and ammonium sulphate. It was estimated that the company could produce 24,000 tons of ammonium sulphate per year, and the War Department agreed to accept the company's entire output for a period of two years and to pay $90 per ton therefor. It was estimated that the company could produce 810,000 gallons of toluol per year, and the War Department agreed to accept the company's entire output for a period of two years and pay $1.50 per gallon therefor. At the time of the signing of the armistice the company had not produced a gallon of toluol or a pound of ammonium sulphate, and, the war being over, the contract was canceled. The company put in a claim for the profits it would have earned if the war had continued and they had been permitted to carry out their contract. It was agreed between the representatives of the War Department and representatives of the company that the difference between the actual value of toluol and the price which the department contracted to pay therefor should be the profit upon each of the 1,620,000 gallons of toluol which it had been estimated that the company could produce in two years. A board was appointed to determine the actual value of toluol, and it was found that toluol was actually worth 17½ cents a gallon, leaving a profit to the company of $1.32½ per gallon upon 1,620,000 gallons of toluol, which this company never manufactured, because the war ended too soon. It was also found that the company was entitled to a profit of $30 per ton of each of 48,000 tons of ammonium sulphate which the company never manufactured, and it was decided that the company was entitled to profits in the aggregate sum of $3,330,040.39, which sum the representatives of this administration paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The Secretary of War at the beginning of this session of Congress reported that he had settled 5,000 claims growing out of war contracts, and the committee of Congress, appointed to investigate expenditures in the War Department, declare that the examples above given constitute a fair illustration of the basis upon which settlements were made by the War Department. Do you longer wonder where your money went Do you believe that the people of the United States, who bought Liberty bonds and thrift stamps, and who did without sugar and lived on brown bread, and the mothers, who spent long weary hours knitting socks and sweaters for the soldiers, and who went day after day to the Red Cross headquarters, without charge, to prepare bandages, and who gave their sons freely to be sacrificed upon the battle fields of France, will be willing to return to power the political party responsible for an administration which expended the people's money in the manner disclosed by this testimony?

Democratic politicians all over the country try to embarrass Republicans by asking why a Republican Congress has not done more for the soldiers. And the answer is simple. A Democratic administration, by the methods indicated above, left us an empty Treasury and a war debt of $25,000,000,000. Every Republican in Congress wants to do more for the soldiers, and we will do more as soon as we can get funds, but first we must meet the fixed charges, as they come due against the Government, left by a Democratic administration.

The testimony taken by the congressional committee further shows that prior to the signing of the armistice we had sufficient motor vehicles in France for ambulance service, for the transportation of munitions and supplies, and for other purposes sufficient to win the war; that under the terms of the armistice we received a large quantity of motor vehicles from Germany. However, the records of the War Department show that between the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918, and the 5th day of June, 1919, the War Department representing this administration during a time when hundreds of thousands of soldiers were being brought home, transported to France 39,993 new automobiles, and after they had been delivered upon French soil, the representatives of this administration sold such automobiles to the French Government for 20 per cent of the cost price, and allowed that Government 10 years in which to make payment therefor.

The testimony taken by the committee shows that prior to the signing of the armistice the War Department had ordered food supplies for an Army of 5,000,000 men. The testimony further shows that, as a matter of fact, the War Department had commandeered 40 per cent of all the foodstuffs of the United States. Within six months after the signing of the armistice, more than 2,000,000 men had been demobilized and returned to civil life, and yet, as the testimony shows, the War Department had still retained and refused to release upon the markets for the use of the people of this country, the enormous quantity of foodstuffs, which it held. Mr. Hare, director of sales of the War Department, testified before the committee that it was not until June, 1919, that the War Department declared a surplus of foodstuffs. Mr. Hare was asked to state the policy of the War Department in disposing of its surplus foodstuffs, and in reply he said:

"It was the policy of the director of sales to dispose of the surplus property of the War Department so as to disturb the 'industrial conditions' of the country as little as possible."

The testimony shows that as late as June, 1919, the department was still debating the question as to the best method of disposing of its foodstuffs so as to disturb "industrial conditions" as little as possible, and it appears that "industrial conditions," as used by that department, meant the price of foodstuffs in the markets of the United States. It was decided that to release such an enormous quantity of foodstuffs upon the markets would disturb "industrial conditions" in the food market.

Congress had voted $100,000,000, which the President placed at the disposal of Mr. Hoover, for the purchase of food to feed the hungry in Europe, and the War Department concluded that in order to dispose of the supply of foodstuffs without disturbing "industrial conditions" in this country, it was advisable to cable Mr. Hoover urging him to use the hundred million dollars appropriated by Congress for the purchase of foodstuffs held by the War Department, thereby preventing such foodstuffs from being sold into the markets of the country, with the consequent danger of disturbing such markets. And this was done in the face of the fact that the War Department at that time had hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of canned meats and other foodstuffs already in France, and for which the Army had no further use.

In response to this request Mr. Hoover purchased 22,869 pounds of cured meats from the War Department, and transported them from this country to Europe in order not to disturb "industrial conditions" in this country. And that at a time when the people all over the country were pleading for a reduction in the high cost of living.

The testimony shows that when the armistice was signed the War Department had 200,000,000 cans of vegetables, such as peas, squash, corn, tomatoes, pumpkin, etc. It was urged by the War Department that it was not practicable to put these vegetables upon the market, because it was said the Army cans were much larger than those to which the public had been accustomed, and hence they would not be salable, the Army cans weighing from 2 to 5 pounds each. A Republican Congress passed resolutions calling attention to this enormous supply of vegetables and urging that they be placed upon the market, and pursuant to these resolutions a small portion of this food was finally offered for sale to the public. So eager were the people to buy it that they almost tore the doors from the storehouses.

The National Canners' Association became much disturbed less this enormous quantity of vegetables should be dumped upon the market, thereby disturbing "industrial conditions" in the vegetable market, and the testimony shows that the president of the association, one Frank Gerber, wrote a letter to Gen. H. J. Rogers protesting. That letter was referred to Col. A. M. Davis, Director of Storage, Quartermaster Corps of the War Department, an officer of this administration, who wrote the following letter in reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PURCHASE, STORAGE AND TRAFFIC DIVISION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF PURCHASE AND STORAGE,
Washington, D. C., March 17, 1919.

Mr. FRANK GERBER,
President National Canners' Association, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GERBER: Your letter of March 15 to Maj. Gen. H. J. Rogers has been delivered to me for reply. I am glad to be able to relieve your mind on the subject of any surplus canned vegetables to be dumped on the market.

Acting along lines suggested by you, canned peas, corn, squash, and string beans will be added to the ration list, which has always contained tomatoes. This will entirely dispose of our stock and eliminate surplus.

I trust this letter will relieve your mind and those of your associates in the Canners' Association.

Yours, very truly,

A. M. DAVIS,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps, Director of Storage.

Col. Davis was called before the committee of Congress investigating war expenditures, and was asked to explain the meaning of such letter. (See p. 53, vol. 2, committee testimony.) His testimony indicates that it was the purpose of the War Department, in order to avoid the danger of disturbing "industrial conditions," to dispose of this enormous quantity of vegetables, so as to prevent them from coming upon the food market in this country, and in this connection the following extract from his testimony is interesting:

"Mr. REAVIS. That is, you mean that the American people would have no opportunity of buying this surplus?

"Col. DAVIS. That is the point exactly.

"Mr. REAVIS. And that was done to protect the canners?

"Col. DAVIS. Yes, sir."

Think of such evidence, showing that officials in Washington were holding food and trying to sell it in Europe in order to keep from reducing prices of food in the United States. And that at a time when the people of this country were led to believe that the administration was doing everything within its power to reduce the high cost of living.

You will doubtless recall that during the summer and fall of last year the supply of sugar in this country was so short that sugar was selling for 20 cents per pound and that the public was subjected to rations even at that price, and yet the testimony taken by the committee shows that during the same period the War Department sold 22,000,000 pounds of sugar in France at 2 cents per pound rather than hazard "industrial conditions" by shipping it home and placing it upon the American market.

The testimony shows that when the armistice was signed our Government had in France foodstuffs, clothing, textiles, automobiles, and other supplies of an approximate value of $2,000,000,000, and that the representatives of this administration sold that enormous quantity of supplies to the French Government for $400,000,000, or 20 per cent of its real value, on long-term payments, in order to avoid disturbing "industrial conditions" in this country.

Not only has the administration in power, and for which the Democratic Party is responsible, kept millions of dollars' worth of foodstuffs off the American market in order to avoid disturbing "industrial conditions," but it has permitted large quantities of this foodstuff to spoil, thereby depriving the people of its use. I do not know to what extent this waste has gone, but the evidence taken by the Committee on War Expenditures shows that 2,000,000 pounds of ham were permitted to spoil in the storehouses at Baltimore and 1,497,000 pounds of bacon were destroyed in the same way at Norfolk, Va.

We have heard much concerning the high cost of living in this country. We have read interesting accounts in the newspapers of the tremendous efforts of the administration, through the Attorney General and other Federal officials, to reduce the cost of living, and the public has been led to believe that they were really in earnest about it; and yet, could any reasonable person believe, in the face of the testimony above disclosed, that if this enormous quantity of foodstuffs, which the testimony shows amounted to approximately 40 per cent of all the foodstuffs in the United States, had been turned back into the market as readily as the soldiers were turned back to civil life the price of food would not have been reduced to a minimum and the problem of the high cost of living would not have thus been solved?

Friends of the administration have contended as an excuse for the administration that under the stress of war it was impossible to prevent waste, but the testimony taken by the committee discloses the fact that a great bulk of the foodstuffs of this country was dissipated and that millions of dollars were wasted upon contracts by the War Department after the armistice had been signed and the war ended.

Friends of the administration, in speeches and statements in the public press, delight to ask why a Republican Congress has not reduced the cost of living. The above testimony discloses the answer to that question. The only way to reduce the cost of living is to increase the supply of foodstuffs available on the market. The people of this country, in their desire to win the war, had produced and conserved and saved; they had eaten brown bread and done without sugar until great quantities of foodstuffs were available when the armistice was signed. But the testimony shows that 40 per cent of this foodstuff was held and kept off the market by the War Department of this administration; that this Democratic administration hoarded more foodstuffs than all the profiteers in the land combined. Had it so desired, the administration could have released this great food supply as it demobilized the soldiers, and the food market would thus have been brought down to a normal state. But instead it preferred to retain this foodstuff until much of it had spoiled in order that the food market in this country might not be disturbed, thus making it possible for the food profiteer to reap a harvest unparalleled in history.

When you remember the courage and valor of our soldiers who won the war, the sacrifice and fortitude of our women in their efforts to support and sustain these soldiers at the front, the unquestioning loyalty of our masses during that dreadful and bloody struggle, do you believe that the American people will again return to power an administration or a party responsible for such profligate mismanagement and waste?

Sincerely, yours, C. A. NEWTON.

NATIONAL SCREW THREAD COMMISSION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he will yield to me for a moment before he begins his remarks, which I would not interrupt.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. There is a joint resolution which has been reported from the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures. It has passed the House. It continues the commission that has been working on the question of standardization. If it is not passed before the 20th, the commission expires by limitation of law. It involves no expense at all to the Government, I am informed. I think the House acted on it with practical unanimity. The House committee has been sending over here urging action. I was going to ask if I could not get the consent of the Senator who has the floor and the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up that joint resolution. I do not think there will be any discussion on it. If there is, I will immediately withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield for that purpose?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri for the purpose he has stated.

Mr. REED. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 299) extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of two years from March 21, 1920.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the term of the National Screw Thread Commission, created by an act approved July 18, 1918, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, extended for an additional period of two years from March 21, 1920.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the debate or the consideration of the peace treaty any more than I can help, but I desire at the present time to bring to the attention of the Senate a very important question involving the problem which now faces the country in regard to the coal industry. There is nothing so vital to the interests of the country as a proper distribution of coal, and at the present time there are several agencies controlling this industry and, in my opinion, to some extent interfering with it.

The former Director General of the Railroads, at the present time acting under powers conferred upon him by the Fuel Administrator, Dr. Garfield, and also acting under powers conferred by a proclamation of the President, is seizing coal belonging to other shippers and diverting it for essential industries. There is a classification of priorities, and among those prior industries are the railroads. The strike, the weather conditions, the shortage of cars, the fact that there is a great demand for export coal have created a shortage of supply, and the railroads of the country are suffering from a lack of coal.

In recognition of the fact that the railroads are a most important and most essential industry, the Director General, or the Acting Fuel Administrator, whatever you may call him, Mr. Hines, has seized coal which has been shipped to a large extent to various industries throughout the country, and I am inundated with complaints, and so are other Senators, complaining against this policy of the Director General. The Government at the present time is paying no attention to this problem; neither is the Congress.

A subcommittee, of which I am chairman, of the Committee on Interstate Commerce has been making a study of the subject and has attempted to relieve the condition by bringing to the attention of the Director General the needs of the operators at the mines owing to the shortage of cars. During the summer months, through that self-constituted clearing house, the production of coal was increased from 6,000,000 tons per week up to 12,000,000 tons, yes, to 15,000,000 tons. When the strike came December 1, by reason of that activity there was a surplus amounting practically to 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 tons, which prevented a great deal of suffering, and prevented any interference with the industrial enterprises of the East, the South, and the Northwest, the Middle West suffering much more than the other sections.

At the present time there is an abnormal situation, a Government agency fixing prices, seizing coal, and throwing the flow of this important commodity out of its normal channels, thereby creating congestion and in many instances embarrassment to the industries in various sections of the country.

The subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee have paid some attention to this problem, and they have come to the conclusion that the primary difficulty at the present time is the Government interference in price fixing and in distribution, and that the practical thing to do at present is to repeal the war powers, which were emergency measures, enacted simply for the purpose of controlling the coal supply during the war, and while there may be an acute situation temporarily, eventually the law of supply and demand will regulate the distribution of coal and we will the more quickly get back to the normal.

Therefore, the subcommittee have prepared a bill which will terminate all the powers with respect to coal and coke conferred on the President by the Lever Act. It provides that after its enactment the President may no longer license the importation, storage, mining, or distribution of coal or coke, requisition these commodities, operate the plant or business of any coal or coke operator or dealer, or regulate the production, sale, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage of coal or coke. In order to wind up the various matters arising out of Federal control of coal and coke, however, the bill provides that all powers necessary for this purpose may be exercised for 30 days after it becomes a law.

Now, there is another abuse that has crept in.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to inquire of the Senator if he proposes to present a bill now and to have any action on the bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am explaining practically the findings of the subcommittee, and I intend to introduce several bills.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will merely introduce a bill and not ask for any action on it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I intend to submit it to the Interstate Commerce Committee and have hearings held upon the bill. Has the Senator any suggestion to make in regard to it?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all. The Senator was referring to a bill, and I did not know whether he had the bill before the Senate or whether it was a proposed bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am stating the conclusions of the subcommittee, and the subcommittee intend to propose certain legislation. As I was stating, one of the abuses which crept in during the war and which existed prior to the war was the confiscation by the railroad companies of supplies of coal invoiced to private consumers. The second section of the bill which I intend to present amends section 1 of the interstate-commerce act and makes it a misdemeanor for any railroad company to confiscate coal in the course of transportation over its lines.

One of the great causes of labor unrest——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. If any other bailiff or custodian of personal property were to take and convert to their own uses personal property it would be regarded under the act of Congress where there is criminal jurisdiction vested or under the criminal code of most States as grand larceny, would it not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It would.

Mr. SHERMAN. And subject you or me or any private citizen to a penitentiary penalty. But the carriers have done that and gone scot free.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has been one of the great abuses in the coal industry that the carriers have confiscated coal invoiced to private consumers, to industries, to public-service corporations.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. That practice, however, is not a result of the war? It existed before the war?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It existed before the war, according to the testimony of the public-service corporations in several States before the subcommittee.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I have had in the past knowledge of a great many instances of that kind, where railroad companies confiscated coal that they were shipping for dealers or other people.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has been quite a common practice.

Mr. NORRIS. The practice now is not any greater, I suppose, than it was before the war?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Oh, it is greater than it has been. During the war, recognizing the importance of transportation——

Mr. NORRIS. During the war I think it would be justified. Of course, it would be necessary. But is the practice now any worse than it was?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In my opinion it is worse.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator another question. The Senator speaks of Mr. Hines doing that now. Is Mr. Hines still acting in a railroad capacity or a governmental capacity?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is not acting in a railroad capacity, as he has no power as Director General of Railroads, because those powers have been repealed.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I understood.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is acting, however, as the Fuel Administrator or as an individual with the powers conferred upon the Fuel Administrator by a proclamation of the President regarding distribution, which powers the President has under the Lever Act.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me ask the Senator if in the exercise of that power Mr. Hines is now engaged in confiscating coal and turning it over to the railroads? Is that the complaint?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is so engaged; he has created a system of regional control, has appointed subagents or representatives and assistants throughout the country, and, by reason of the fact that there is a great shortage of coal and the railroads need the supply, he has established a system of priorities of which the railroads are in the first class.

Mr. NORRIS. Will this bill repeal that authority?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This bill will repeal that authority and will give him 30 days to clear up the business.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I want to ask the Senator if the committee believe that so long as this shortage exists—and that, I understand, is really at the bottom of the difficulty—it will not be necessary for some governmental authority to adopt some system by which priorities can be agreed upon, and thus prevent the cessation, for instance, of the operation of the railroads? If it is more important that they should operate than that some other industries shall, will it not be more necessary for them to have the coal than that other industries shall have it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator recognizes the fact that the strike, the shortage of cars, and the weather conditions have created a great shortage of coal?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think we all recognize that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But that from this time on conditions will improve?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The feeling expressed by one of Mr. Hines's assistants this morning was that by the 1st of May this condition would be relieved.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any complaint made that in the work of distribution of which Mr. Hines is in charge he has been unfair to any of the industries; that in the adoption of the various priorities for different industries he has not done the square thing?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the methods employed by Mr. Hines, the Director General of Railroads, in my opinion, have been ruthless and illegal to the extent of usurping powers which he does not possess, but which have been necessary to compose the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that such action would be illegal on the part of anybody who took coal without buying it of the owner; but the point I want to get at, if the Senator will permit me, is whether, while we have this great shortage of coal, it will not be necessary for some instrumentality to divide it up and thus prevent too much coal being allowed to industries that are not absolutely necessary while compelling other industries which are necessary to shut down?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It may be necessary to continue this system longer than 30 days; but I want to say to the Senator that the Interstate Commerce Committee is in full cooperation with Mr. Hines and that nothing will be done which will impair or impede the transportation system of the country. One of the most pernicious practices at present is the price-fixing power under the fuel-control act, as well as the power to seize and divert coal.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will yield in a moment. Therefore, the committee feel that the sooner these powers are repealed the better off the country and the industries will be. Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. EDGE. While I am in thorough accord with the policy expressed by the bill as it has been presented by my colleague [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], I have this thought: In his judgment, with the present admitted shortage of coal, does he feel that this bill will gradually accomplish the one thing which I think is primarily in the mind of everyone, and that is a reduction in the price of coal, by permitting the operation of the law of supply and demand, which will in the event of a shortage of coal mean some competition for its delivery? Does the Senator feel that ultimately this legislation will tend to reduce the price of coal?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not. I think that there will have to be further legislation enacted, which I intend to propose at this time, which will directly affect not only the price of coal but the present restless condition of labor at the mines.

Mr. EDGE. The reason I suggested the query was to bring out that thought, because in this bill, as I understand, we are abolishing price fixing. I am in absolute accord with that idea. I think the sooner we do that and take the Government away from price fixing the better; but it was my view that further legislation certainly would be necessary in order that the question of prices might be somewhat relieved.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the committee contemplate reporting a bill to take the control of waterway transportation out of the hands of the Government? There is a great deal of fuel sent by barges down the rivers of the Middle West.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can not answer the Senator as to whether or not the proposed act repeals the authorization for the Tidewater Committee. I think the powers of the Tidewater Committee are exercised under the Lever Act. I am not certain as to that; but I wish to emphasize that this is one of the most important problems that this Congress has to consider. We have been doing nothing in regard to the coal industry. We pay attention to all other industries, through the Federal Trade Commission, through the Interior Department, through the Department of Commerce, through the Shipping Board, and yet the Government has absolutely no bureau charged with the duty of handling the coal situation. It has long been neglected, and I intend to bring that fact to attention and later to propose certain legislation in regard to it.

In their efforts to do something with this problem the committee intends to propose another measure. One of the great difficulties at the present time in regard to the distribution of coal is the shortage of cars at the mines. Every mine operator in this country is complaining of the shortage of cars.

One of the complaints of the Miners' Union was that during the summer months they were idle; that they did not have the opportunity of working six days in the week, and, therefore, they demanded a shorter week and shorter hours, believing that that would relieve the situation. I do not believe that ever before in the history of the country were the industries not only here but in Europe so much in need of coal.

If the mines of the country are operated with the present number of miners, I think about 500,000, 230 days a year, there can be produced in this country 800,000,000 tons of coal. The needs of the country are approximately 500,000,000 tons; Europe will need from 100,000,000 to 150,000,000 tons. Therefore the problem we have to consider is that of affording the facilities for the mine operators to load and transport their coal.

Those who heard the debate on the railroad bill know that there is a shortage of railway equipment in this country as well as a great shortage of cars. If that situation can be remedied I believe that many of the difficulties which we have had to face in regard to labor troubles, to the closing down of industries, and to unfair seizures of coal will be relieved.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I should like to ask the Senator if he has been informed of the fact that there are still a great many coal cars, ordinarily used in the eastern field, so-called, that have not been returned from the West and the Northwest, where they were sent to relieve that section of the country during the strike period. My information is, I will state to the Senator from New Jersey, that some 30,000 cars were sent to the West and Northwest during the strike, and that until very recently some of those cars loaded with coal were held on sidetracks. They have not been unloaded, because, after the strike was over, coal could be mined and sold cheaper in the West and Northwest from the local mines than it could be purchased and shipped from the East. Does the Senator know whether those cars are now being turned toward the East?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand those conditions are still acute; but now that the railroads are back in the hands of their private owners, the effort will be made by all the railroads to get the cars back on their lines, and undoubtedly that situation will automatically adjust itself.

Mr. CALDER. My information is that those cars loaded with coal have been lying on sidetracks in the West for a period of three months.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator must realize that, with the snow from 5 to 10 feet, many of those cars were practically frozen in on the sidetracks; it was impossible for the railroads to move them; and that is one of the causes of the congestion; but I believe that will automatically regulate itself as the warmer weather comes and the railroads begin to draw back their own cars to their own lines.

Now, what does the committee propose in regard to the car shortage problem? They propose a bill which, if enacted, will in general require freight rates on coal to be 15 per cent below the tariff rates in the spring and summer and 15 per cent above the tariff rates in the fall and winter. It is my purpose to have this bill considered by the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce now investigating the price of coal.

It is believed that legislation requiring lower freight rates on coal during the spring and summer months, and higher freight rates during the fall and winter months, would tend to encourage consumers to develop storage accommodations, to accept deliveries of coal in advance of their seasonal needs, and thus to keep the mines operating more constantly throughout the year. Such legislation could be expected to bring about the following beneficial results:

1. It would stabilize the price of coal. The capacity output of all the coal mines in the United States, assuming fairly constant operation, would far exceed the present consumption. The output of all these mines working, as at present, only intermittently during the spring and summer months, and working to capacity during the fall and winter months, is barely sufficient to supply the current needs and the greatly increased cold-weather demand for coal. During the winter the demand so nearly equals the currently available supply that scarcity prices prevail. In addition to this, the actual cost of production per ton is unduly enhanced because the operator must, during the time his mine is closed down or working intermittently, keep together his organization and expend money for the upkeep and maintenance of the property, all of which must be added to the price of coal which he mines and sells during the rush season. If the demand for coal were reasonably constant throughout the year, many of these costs based on holding plant, capital, and personnel idle for a large portion of the time would disappear, and the price of coal would more nearly represent only current costs of production plus a reasonable profit, leaving no opportunity for charging scarcity prices during the months when the greatest amount of coal is consumed.

Mr. President, I would not take the time of the Senate to read this brief on this bill and delay these proceedings did I not believe that it was absolutely essential that the Senate should consider this problem and have an explanation of this measure. In view of the ruling that statements of this character analyzing a measure can not be printed, I find it necessary to read it into the RECORD, in order that Senators may have a statement on the subject.

I may say that this statement reflects the views and, in fact, embodies the views of Commissioner Clark, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with whom I have conferred in regard to this problem. Therefore I find it necessary to read these four or five pages into the RECORD, because they represent the views of the head of the commission who will administer this proposed law.

The situation is somewhat analogous to that which prevails in the electric-lighting industry, where the rate of 10 or 12 cents per kilowatt-hour charged for current used for lighting includes a large allowance for machinery kept idle throughout the daytime and only employed to handle the peak load in the evening, while the same current is sold for heating purposes at 3 or 4 cents per kilowatt-hour, because its use for this purpose tends to keep all of the power-house machinery operating more constantly.

2. Such legislation would obviate very largely the pressing necessity for more coal cars. The present supply of coal cars, while totally insufficient to handle the fall and winter rush under existing conditions, would be fairly adequate to carry all the coal desired by consumers if this equipment could be kept moving with greater regularity throughout the year, as would be the case if the advantage of lower summer and spring freight rates could be held out to induce consumers to receive coal shipments in advance of their winter needs. Under the present system thousands of coal cars lie idle during the spring and summer, while the whole available supply of coal cars is entirely insufficient to handle the fall and winter emergency.

3. Such legislation would remedy the present inadequacy of terminal facilities. The large amount of coal which must now be transported within a comparatively short time in each year tends to glut already overcrowded terminals. The increasing inability of existing terminal facilities to handle extraordinary seasonal demands without entailing serious delays and disproportionate terminal costs is one of the most glaring weaknesses in the present American railroad transportation system.

I hope the Senators will note this statement:

4. Such a measure would promote regularity of employment in the mines, and would thus settle most of the outstanding grievances of the the miners. Increased compensation for miners, under the present régime, is demanded not so much as an actual wage for work performed but rather as a pension for periods of enforced idleness due to the seasonal demand for coal.

An examination of some of the disadvantages which might appear to inhere in the requirement of lower spring and summer freight rates for coal shipments reveals that most of these objections are untenable:

1. No confusion, either for carriers or shippers, would result from changing the rate on coal twice every year. The proposed legislation prescribes that the carriers shall file their tariff rates on coal in the same manner as at present, and, instead of requiring them to alter these tariffs semiannually, provides an automatic statutory differential below the tariff rate for one portion of the year and above the tariff rate for the remainder of the year, with discretion in the Interstate Commerce Commission to change the amount of the differential where it finds necessary.

2. The revenues of the carriers would not be affected. A large amount of coal would still have to be mined and shipped in fall and winter to consumers who lacked the capital, credit, foresight, or storage accommodations to enable them to secure their supply during the warmer months. If the 30 per cent differential in favor of the months between April and August, inclusive, should prove an unnecessarily large inducement, so that too great a proportion of coal were shipped during this period, the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to change the percentage so as to balance the summer and winter shipments properly.

3. The transportation of coal in the spring and summer would not embarrass the railroads in handling other seasonal movements—for example, crops. In some localities cars carrying grain are loaded only in one direction, returning empty to the point of origin because of lack of shipments moving in that direction. If coal could be encouraged to move at the same time, this wasteful practice of hauling empty cars might be at least partially eliminated. Operating conditions during the clear weather of the spring and summer months are much more favorable, so that railroads can better withstand heavy demands for transportation at that period of the year than during the fall and winter months, when coal has heretofore moved in greatest volume. The cost to the railroads of transporting coal is also much less in warm weather, when locomotives can haul heavier trains, when they consume less fuel, and when fewer employees can handle more traffic.

4. The acquisition of more coal cars does not afford a practicable and complete remedy for existing difficulties. Under the transportation act recently approved the Interstate Commerce Commission is given the power to require carriers to provide themselves with sufficient cars. But most of the railroads have neither the money nor the credit with which to buy a supply of coal cars adequate for current needs under the present system of large seasonal shipments, so it would be useless for the commission to order them to purchase this equipment. On the other hand, most of the railroads which have enough money or credit to finance such purchases already possess an adequate number of coal cars to care for the needs of their own patrons, and they could not reasonably be required by the commission to purchase additional cars to take care of the traffic of other lines.

The transportation act also appropriates $300,000,000 as a revolving fund from which loans may be made to the railroads. In view of the fact, however, that this money will very likely be used only in small part for new equipment, and that of the portion which is spent for equipment much will go for new locomotives, refrigerator cars, and other types of urgently needed rolling stock, it is not probable that any considerable number of coal cars will be purchased out of this fund. It has been estimated that 100,000 new coal cars will be necessary to handle properly the usual seasonable demand. These alone would cost the entire amount of the appropriation mentioned above. The same statute also provides for creating a general railroad contingent fund, made up of a portion of the excess earnings of prosperous railroads, out of which loans may be made to the railroads, and out of which the commission may purchase equipment and facilities to be leased to the railroads. This fund will, however, be wholly an expectancy for many months to come, and at least one more winter, with its heavy demand on the present totally inadequate coal-car supply, would elapse before any relief could be had from this quarter. Even if funds were immediately available with which to purchase coal cars, and only coal cars were to be built, the car shops in the United States could not turn out sufficient cars between now and next fall to handle properly the coal shipments during the winter of 1920–21, assuming that the proposed legislation is not enacted in the meantime. Finally, even if this money were obtainable and cars would be turned out in sufficient quantity, the acquisition of cars which, under the present system of uniform freight rates on coal, would stand idle the greater part of the year would entail enormous depreciation and capital charges, all of which would have to be borne by the coal transported during the rush season.

5. It may be urged that the interstate-commerce act now contains ample provisions to permit the commission or the carriers to institute lower summer freight rates for coal. The conclusive answer to this contention is that during the many years that the same provisions have been law this practice has never been introduced. When the carriers have been asked to initiate such seasonal rates on coal, the request has usually been coupled with a demand that while rates might be lowered in summer, they should not be raised in the winter; and the carriers, facing a consequent depletion of their revenues, have declined to cooperate on this basis. The shippers and consumers, motivated by their individual needs, have been by no means unanimous as to the amount of the difference in rates or the seasons in which lower or higher rates should prevail. In the very nature of the case, it is a subject for legislation, where Congress, representing all the people, may enact rules which will take into consideration the interests of all the people.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, while it might feel justified in approving schedules initiated by the carriers instituting such seasonal rates, could not make such percentages of difference in rates permanent. The carriers, pressed by coal operators or consumers, might at any time file new schedules abandoning or modifying these seasonal rates. General confusion would result.

It is understood that the commission does not believe that it possesses the power to require the establishment of such seasonal rates on coal. It has never attempted to exercise this power, and it is known that it does not contemplate doing so in the future in the absence of further legislation. The commission assumes that in prescribing rates and practices it is not empowered to initiate new systems of rate making designed principally to remedy general economic situations. It feels that this should be the subject of specific legislative determination and authorization, rather than of mere administrative action.

Even if the carriers, the shippers, and the commission could and did institute such seasonal rate schedules, their action in this matter would be the subject of interminable litigation. It would be contended that no power had been delegated to the commission to approve or initiate such seasonal rates, and the action of the commission in this connection would most likely be enjoined until the matter had been decided by the United States Supreme Court. The result would be that two or three winters might elapse before this urgently needed practice could be put into effect. Definite legislation, such as that proposed, will remedy the situation at once. In view of the fact that the courts have upheld similar differences in rates, based on no less cogent economic reasons—e. g., under the so-called long-and-short-haul clause—there should be no doubt as to the constitutionality of the measure proposed.

Mr. President, I feel as if I should apologize to the Senate for having read this long statement of Commissioner Clark, but I believe this question is so important to the country that I have felt that it was very necessary that it should be put into the RECORD.

Briefly stating the effect of this measure, it means that from the 1st of April to the 1st of September consumers of bituminous and anthracite coal, used by the industries of the country to the extent of 500,000,000 tons, heretofore purchased practically during the winter months, will have the opportunity of having 15 per cent reduction in their freight rates and a penalty of 15 per cent advance from the 1st of September for the following six months. It means that it will induce the purchase of coal in the summer and, according to Commissioner Clark, will release 250,000 coal cars, which are idle during that period, at a time when the railroads are not congested, and at a time when the coal may be moved more efficiently and effectively.

I believe that this will solve the great problem in regard to the coal miner's complaint that he is compelled during the summer months to remain idle a long period.

Therefore, feeling that this measure will be beneficial to the coal industry, we have decided to present it to the Senate, and ask that the Committee on Interstate Commerce consider it carefully, hopeful that it will be enacted into law.

A statement has been made by some one who has studied this question that it will save $1,000,000,000 a year to the country in the wastage that now exists.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. This matter was presented to me a number of days ago by a number of iron and steel interests in Ohio, and they at that time recommended the plan proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. The only question I had in my mind was whether or not this legislation was necessary. My tentative opinion was that in view of the fact that under the recent railroad legislation we had given to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to fix both maximum and minimum rates, they would probably have the power to do just what the Senator from New Jersey is now suggesting. But I understand that those who have gone into the legal phase of the question are of the opinion that they do not have that authority. That being so, I am inclined to favor the legislation which has been proposed. I believe that it will give relief, and it will make the employment of the miners more steady in the bituminous region. During the summer months in Ohio the mines are largely idle, and more active use can be made of the coal cars if these mines are kept in operation; and I think it would be some inducement, not only to the domestic consumer, but to the industrial consumer as well, to buy and store his coal for the winter use, if there is a differential in freight rates during that time.

This morning I received a telegram from the Youngstown Chamber of Commerce which bears upon the coal situation, and with the permission of the Senate will read it:

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, March 16, 1920.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Coal shortage has curtailed industrial production in this territory at least 50 per cent of time during past three weeks and temporarily throwing thousands of men out of employment. Car supply in Pittsburgh and Connellsville region inadequate, but results more serious since central coal administration reinstated priority list. Would recommend the cancellation of priority list on coal and the establishment of positive orders by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the return of open-top cars to owning roads in this territory. Understand western and southern railroads have from 120 to 250 per cent supply of this class of equipment, while lines in coal-producing territory are ranging from 20 to 60 per cent supply of coal cars owned by them.

YOUNGSTOWN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The same condition exists in Cleveland and elsewhere; and more than that, the railroads have been exceedingly careless in this, that many of these cars are loaded with ashes and permitted to stand on tracks, when they should be unloaded and used for coal-carrying purposes.

Again, many of these coal cars are being used for the transportation of automobiles at the very time they are needed for coal purposes, and my belief is that this situation can be remedied in part now by a more careful supervision by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and I know from personal conferences I have had with the secretary of the commission that they are very active in attempting to give relief at this time.

But I want to commend to Senators the consideration of the bill which is proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there is one other measure which I shall introduce on behalf of the committee—to provide for the appointment of a Federal coal commissioner with advisory powers.

There has been a neglect of the coal industry, as far as the United States Government is concerned. There is no informative bureau to keep track and make a study of the industry and to inform Congress if legislation is necessary. Therefore a bill has been prepared, which I shall introduce, to set up an agency to obtain information about the coal industry and to provide some method to prevent a recurrence of practices which in the past and at the present time cause serious inconvenience to the public.

The bill provides that the President shall appoint a Federal coal commissioner, with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of five years, at an annual salary of $10,000; that the commissioner is empowered to employ a secretary, clerks, and other employees, and to rent suitable offices. It is made the duty of the commissioner to investigate from time to time the distribution, storage, and sale of coal.

It has been stated that if some agency in Washington could induce the railroads and industries of the country to store, in the summer, quantities of coal, the suffering, the sacrifice, and the embarrassment to the industries, occasioned by bad weather conditions or by strikes, would be to a large extent overcome. No one would fear the effect of a strike if we could store in the South, in the West, in the North, and in the Northwest quantities of coal for use; and, therefore, if it were somebody's business, somewhere in this country, to stimulate the production and the storage and the distribution of coal, it undoubtedly would relieve a very acute situation.

Therefore this has been proposed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me as bearing upon that point, many of these large industrial consumers do store their coal, and these iron and steel mills store it in large quantities. But the difficulty at the present time is due to the fact that the large amount they had on hand was consumed because of the coal strike, and now they find themselves short.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If there were a distributing point, the smaller consumers, whose need is, in proportion, just as much as that of the larger, would have it available.

Mr. POMERENE. That is quite true.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The bill provides that the commissioner shall compile labor statistics, that he shall inform himself as to prices and costs, as to the statutory provisions, the kinds and grades of coal, and create an advisory plan of a zoning system; in other words, it is to be practically an exchange or a clearing house, without any executive powers, but simply ministerial powers.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate any further to explain this measure. I will do so if the committee should report it, and believe it is a wise provision.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce, for reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, three bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bills will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 4087) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended;

A bill (S. 4088) to terminate Federal control of the coal and coke industry, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 4089) to provide for the appointment of a Federal coal commissioner, to define his powers and duties, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, some time ago there was inserted in the RECORD some matter which was more defamatory than critical of the public services of Herbert Hoover. A prominent journalist of Georgia wrote me on the subject and asked me to ascertain what Mr. Hoover had to say concerning this and other matters, principally relating to cotton seed. In answer to a letter from me he wrote me this reply, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 13, 1920.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am greatly obliged for the defamatory propaganda which you sent me, and which I return herewith. It seems to me impossible to answer such foolish things. As to the circular of F. W. Davis, from Texas, his grievance seems to be (a) that I did not control the price of shoes (which had nothing to do with the Food Administration); (b) that I did not control the railway car shortage, and therefore some perishables decayed in Texas (and I did not head the Railroad Administration); (c) that the cottonseed producers of the South were discontented with the arrangements made for marketing their material.

The latter does concern the Food Administration, and the arrangements made with regard to cotton seed during the Food Administration were set up on direct application from the cotton growers, as shown by attached document (No. 1), at a meeting with them and signed by their representatives. The plans put in force were entirely worked out with them, approved by them, and at their express wish, being their proposal, and document No. 2 being the announcement of conditions. I inclose herewith document No. 3, copy of the resolution passed spontaneously by the cottonseed committees at the termination of these arrangements.

So far as Mr. Barrett's views on the price of wheat and cotton seed are concerned, he was a member of a commission appointed by the President to recommend a fair price for wheat, in which I did not participate. He unanimously agreed with the others on the price, and I attach a copy of the commission's report, document No. 4. The officers of his association signed the above-mentioned cottonseed proposals also. He can therefore scarcely complain of that matter. Subsequently he was appointed to sit on an agricultural advisory board to represent the farmers at the Food Administration, and apparently because he did not agree with the other 38 members he ceased to attend their meetings. Through this board he always had the opportunity to make representations to the Food Administration, and there was no case that I know of where the recommendations of this board were not supported by me and carried out to the full extent of the administration's ability. This board finally wound up also with a very handsome and spontaneous resolution expressing gratitude to the Food Administration for the way farmer interests had been handled. (Doc. No. 5.)

I do not assume that any amount of endeavor to keep out of politics or any amount of sacrifice in public service entitles one to immunity, so I have refused to take notice of these things. I am always anxious for my friends to know the truth, so that I send you the documents which disprove these statements.

Yours, faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

MEMORANDUM.

"SEPTEMBER 4, 1918.

"At a meeting of the State food administrators held in Washington to-day it was decided to accept the recommendation of the organized cottonseed producers as expressed by the commissioners of agriculture and markets and officials of the farmers' unions and other organizations in the several cotton States to stabilize the price of cotton seed at the average price of last year, the fundamental basis being on a yield of 41 gallons of oil, f. o. b. cars.

"The Food Administration has also consulted with the representatives of the crushers, refiners, and lard substitute manufacturers as to the formulation of regulations and voluntary agreements so as to give effect to the producers' recommendations for a stabilized price throughout the year.

"The price of seed on the basis recommended by the producers will vary from $64 to $72 in carload lots, f. o. b. cars, depending upon the yield in oil, which varies from zone to zone. Using this basis price the Food Administration has settled with the refiners to purchase oil at 17½ cents f. o. b. mills, and the Food Administration will assist the refiners to hold this price throughout the year.

"Differentials have been fixed for crushing seed in consultation with the crushers' association on the basis of last year's costs and regulated profit of last year, plus the increased cost imposed by change in labor, transportation, and supplies.

"The result is that the price of meal will vary from $50 to $57 in bags, depending upon the protein content, or roughly $3 per ton higher than last year.

"The Food Administration has strongly recommended to the War Industries Board that the price of linters should be increased so as to bear its proper share of the burden and increased cost of manufacture, and any change in this direction will be applied to a reduction in the price of meal.

"The proposal of the cottonseed producers to accept the average price of cotton seed for last year, despite the lower yield of cotton and the increased cost of production, is a concession on their part to the cattle-feeding and dairy interests in this country.

"The Food Administration would have been glad to have arrived at a result that would have made the price of meal exactly the same as last year to the feeding industry, but it is impossible to maintain the price of oil if it were increased above the present figure, owing to the relatively lower basis for vegetable oils.

"The Food Administration feels satisfied that the stabilization of this industry by voluntary agreements of all elements of the industry will greatly eliminate speculation that would otherwise take place, and that all interests will have been protected in so doing.

"The details of the seed prices assessed to local zones and yields will be issued by the State food administrators in each State."

"APRIL 2, 1919.

"At a meeting of representatives of the war service committee of the Farmers' Cottonseed Growers, Refiners, and Lard Substitute Manufacturers held in Washington on April 2, 1919, all parties concerned in the cottonseed industry unanimously adopted the following resolutions and presented them to the Food Administration:

"Resolved, That we commend the efforts of the Food Administration in stabilizing cotton seed and its products, which stabilization has enabled the farmers to secure a fair price for their seed, protected the consumer by enabling him to buy at reasonable prices, prevented violent fluctuation as well as hoarding and profiteering, and also indirectly stabilized other edible fats and prevented undue advances in same.

"Further resolved, That we believe that for the present the stabilizing program as established by the Food Administration should be continued.

"Further resolved, That the opening of the New York Produce Exchange for trading in cottonseed oil should be deferred until the stabilization program is discontinued.

"Respectfully submitted,

"_____ _____."

DOCUMENT NO. 4.

"To the President of the United States:

"The undersigned committee has been asked by you to recommend the price which the Government should pay for the 1917 crop of wheat.

"In its deliberations the committee has kept constantly in mind the three following factors:

"First. The fact that the United States is at war.

"Second. The need of encouraging the producer.

"Third. The necessity of reducing the cost of living to the consumer.

"The normal laws of supply and demand have been violently interfered with and Congress has undertaken to offset this disturbance by conferring extraordinary powers upon the President to stabilize prices. Each of the foregoing factors grows out of conditions which have received the careful attention of the committee. Chief among them are: That the wheat yield in a great and important section of the country has this year been below the normal; that over against this situation is the crying need among the whole body of the population, especially the wage earners, that the rising tide of costs shall be stayed and reduced as rapidly as possible consistent with the welfare of the producer; that the Government is at the present time engaged in the great task of reducing and stabilizing cost of other staple commodities; that the wheat of the world is abundant for its needs, even disregarding the stores in Russia, but because of lack of shipping and war conditions the burden of supplying wheat to the Allies and to neutral nations rests for the time being upon the United States and Canada.

"Your committee has also considered the fact that the Government price for the 1917 wheat crop is in effect a continuing guaranty until the minimum price guaranteed by Congress for the crop of 1918 goes into effect (July 1, 1918). It has considered the relation of the 1918 minimum-price guaranty to the price here recommended. It has also considered the effect which an early termination of the war would have upon the wheat markets of the world.

"In reaching its conclusion the committee has been guided by the principles you have announced, that a fair price should be based upon the cost of production for the entire country, plus a reasonable profit. We have relied upon the cost estimates for the crop of 1917 furnished by the United States Department of Agriculture, checked by the results of our independent investigations and the evidence submitted to the committee by producers and their representatives.

"The committee has considered the regulations recently established by the United States Food Administration Grain Corporation for the different grades of the wheat through which all transactions in wheat are to be standardized and speculation to be entirely eliminated. Also that profits to the grain dealer, miller, and flour dealer have been regulated and reduced by the Grain Corporation, effecting a material reduction in the cost of flour.

"In consideration of the foregoing facts and circumstances, this committee respectfully recommends that the price on No. 1 northern spring wheat, or its equivalent, at Chicago be $2.20 per bushel.

DOCUMENT NO. 5.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, March 10, 1919.

Hon. HERBERT C. HOOVER,
Hotel Crillon, Paris, France.

MY DEAR MR. HOOVER: The purposes for which the national agricultural advisory committee was called into existence having been fully accomplished, I am to-day, by the consent of Secretary Houston and of the present representatives of the Food Administration in Washington, vacating my offices in the Department of Agriculture and notifying the members of the committee that there will be no further call upon us as such from either of the departments mentioned. It is unnecessary, if indeed it is not impossible, for me to add anything by way of appreciation of your administration to what has already been conveyed to you through the medium of a resolution unanimously passed by the live-stock subcommittee and given to Judge Glasgow and Mr. Snyder with the request that a copy be conveyed to you, and that such use of the resolution would be made in this country as to these gentlemen might seem proper. I wish, however, for myself and in behalf of the entire committee, to renew and emphasize our indorsement, individually and collectively, of your administration and of your splendid achievements as a most important factor in winning the war and now a factor of world-wide importance in the adjustment of the most acute of all the postwar problems. I feel that I represent the sentiment of the committee when I say that we feel ourselves greatly honored in having been coworkers with you in the great crisis through which we have passed; and now that our connection with your work has ceased, we unite in an abiding interest and confidence in your continuing success in even a larger, if not more important, field of endeavor. In a personal sense, if I may be permitted to refer to this side of our associations, I beg that you will accept my own assurances of high regard and esteem and my most sincere good wishes for your happiness in the days that are to come.

Very sincerely, yours,

H. C. STUART,
Chairman National Agricultural Advisory Committee.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1919.

"Whereas there has come to the attention of the live-stock commitee of the national agricultural advisory committee, through press reports and public statements, certain criticisms of the United States Food Administration; and

"Whereas these outgivings have made it clear to us that there is, in some quarters, a lamentable lack of knowledge respecting basic facts connected with the stimulation of production, encouragement of conservation, and control distribution of foods; and

"Whereas such complaints as have come to our attention have shown no evidence of having taken into consideration the unescapable obligation entered into by the Food Administration to secure increased food supplies for the necessary protection of our own population as well as that of our allies, including both civil and military needs, nor a due appreciation of the difficulties attending the merchandising transition from a war to a peace basis; and

"Whereas the space limitations of these resolutions give no adequate opportunity to direct attention to the broad foundations laid by Mr. Herbert Hoover, the United States Food Administrator, for the purpose of insuring essential food supplies for war needs, but feeling that we can not do otherwise than record our judgment of the purpose, the spirit, and the accomplishments of his administration: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the said live-stock committee, now in session in Washington, That we here record our high sense of appreciation of the extraordinary ability and uniform fairness with which Herbert Hoover has met and discharged the weighty responsibilities which have devolved upon him in stimulating home production, without which we would now be facing a world shortage of food and consequent higher cost of living; in eliminating speculative control of wheat and other essential products, which has ever been harmful alike to producer and consumer; in conserving food and foodstuffs; and in supplying the wants of the millions who were and still are dependent upon American resources for the necessaries of life.

"The committee has not agreed at all times with the policies of Mr. Hoover in dealing with national agricultural interests and questions, but it and all of its members have accepted uncomplainingly his decisions after a full and fair hearing of each case upon its merits. We have seen restrictions placed on consumption through the inauguration of wheatless and meatless days, by the requirement of the use of substitutes, and by other policies which narrowed the markets for agricultural products. This has occurred at times when prices seemed already unduly limited, considering the war costs of production.

"We are, however, convinced that every act of the Food Administrator has been conceived and executed in a desire to deal fairly with the American people, both producers and consumers, equitably yet firmly with the various agencies of distribution, and generously with our struggling allies.

"We are of opinion that no agency or department of the Government has done a greater work, and that no man of the many chosen for important national and international service has earned a higher place in public esteem and admiration than has the man who played so notable a part in guiding and bringing together the producers and consumers of the country, and who, by his rightful possession of the confidence of all classes at home and abroad, brought a united citizenship into voluntary contribution of sacrifice and service."

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Glass	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Borah	Gronna	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Bandegee	Hale	Moses	Smoot
Calder	Harding	New	Spencer
Capper	Harris	Norris	Stanley

Elkins	King	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Kirby	Sheppard	Warren
France	La Follette	Shields	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Simmons	Wolcott
Gerry	Lodge	Smith, Ga.

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understand the parliamentary situation of the pending reservation. The situation is rather anomalous. The caption of the reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] reads as follows:

Reservation proposed by Mr. OWEN to resolution of ratification of German peace treaty.

There is no resolution of ratification now pending, I understand.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I know it has been held by the Vice President, and I think by the present occupant of the chair, that the reservations are independent propositions, to be subsequently added to the resolution of ratification. As an independent proposition an amendment, not in the form of a substitute but simply as an addition, has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. To that an amendment has been offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Therefore the rule as to motions to strike out and insert does not apply, and any motion now, it seems to me, would clearly be in the third degree.

Mr. KING. If the premise of the Senator from Massachusetts is correct, his conclusion is proper and inevitable. I do not rise for the purpose of combating the views which have been expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, although I think there might be a very strong argument made upon the other side.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me a moment, there can be no debate upon the question that another proposition would be in the third degree if you admit that the reservation is an independent proposition, which I think has been held by both occupants of the chair, and correctly held, as I think.

Mr. KING. I agree with the statement just made by the Senator from Massachusetts. If it be admitted that each reservation is an independent proposition, then, of course, no further amendment could be submitted to the pending reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma and the various amendments thereto, because it would be in the third degree; but I desire to suggest to the Chair the question as to whether there is an independent proposition now pending before the Senate.

For the purpose of obtaining the judgment of the Chair, whose experience and parlimentary knowledge are far superior to mine, I offer as a substitute for the pending reservation, with the amendments and modifications and qualifications which have been submitted, the following, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are no rules of the Senate which cover the question just raised by the Senator from Utah, but the Chair, in harmony with the ruling which it understands has already been made, will hold that the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is an original proposition, and, there being two amendments already offered to that proposition, the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Utah is not in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the proposed substitute which I offer may be read, and then I shall ask my good friend, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who is not here, if he will consent to withdrawing his amendment and permitting mine to be regarded as within the proper degree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the information of the Senate, the Secretary will read the substitute offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed, in lieu of the reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and the amendments thereto, to substitute as follows:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war. The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination of peoples and equality of all Governments pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations, at the close of the present war with Germany it will recognize the political independence of Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and the Virgin Islands, and also the Territory of Hawaii: Provided, That a majority of the residents of said Territory over the age of 21 years vote for such independence. And the United States further understands that in fulfillment of said principle Great Britain and Japan, respectively, will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the republic of Ireland and the ancient kingdom of Korea, and agree that they become members of the League of Nations with equal representation accorded to other sovereign and independent Governments.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I will yield first to the Senator from Minnesota, as he rose first.

Mr. KELLOGG. I just want to say a word on this matter——

Mr. KING. I will yield the floor for the moment.

Mr. REED. I wanted to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not wish to stand in the United States Senate and discuss the merits of such a proposition as that and the one preceding it about this country declaring for the independence of Ireland and Korea. I am astonished that Members of the United States Senate would think of adopting a reservation in violation of every principle on which this country is founded and every principle of our history, that we are going to declare for the self-determination of parts of sovereign nations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator from Minnesota any doubt that the Senator from Utah introduced his substitute as an alliustration of the lack of wisdom of any of the amendments? I feel sure that the Senator from Utah presented it as an argument against the reservation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am quite aware that the Senator from Utah was trying to make this whole thing more ridiculous than it is, but I do not think it is possible for him to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. KING. The proposed substitute which I submitted was not offered with the expectation of commanding the support of the Senate. Indeed, it was not intended for that purpose. We are considering questions that have no relation to the treaty. They are wholly extraneous. We are attempting to project this Nation into the affairs of other peoples and of other nations.

Some Senators seem to entertain the view that we can hang upon this treaty every international question, and declare national and international policies that are not germane to the treaty and would be calculated to prevent its acceptance by our allies. There are many grievances in the world, and conditions which we would like to see corrected; but it would not be pertinent or proper, in a treaty of this character, to announce our views or what policies we should like to see pursued. It would have been just as inappropriate for the nations who have ratified the treaty to project themselves into our affairs, and to declare by reservation, amendment, or otherwise that in ratifying the treaty they understood that the United States would within a certain period free the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Alaska, and the Hawaiian Islands, and permit these Territories and possessions to set up independent nations of their own.

My substitute shows the impropriety of the reservation which we are now considering, including the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

I am interested in having the treaty ratified. It seems to me that every Senator who has the welfare of the treaty at heart, and who desires to see it ratified and bring about the peace of the world, should pursue no course that would offer any impediment to ratification, or that would make our resolution of ratification objectionable, and properly objectionable, to any of our allies.

I am therefore opposed to attempting to attach to the treaty reservations that will destroy it, or that will be regarded as an assault upon our allies, or an interference with their domestic and internal affairs.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not addressing my remarks to the Senator from Utah. I was perfectly aware that that was not his object; but there was seriously discussed on the floor of the Senate yesterday a reservation which provides that—

The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principle of self-determination of peoples and the equality of all governments pervading and underlying the covenant of the League of Nations, that Great Britain and Japan, respectively, will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the Republic of Ireland and the ancient Kingdom of Korea, and agree that they become members of the League of Nations with equal rights accorded to all other sovereign and independent governments.

Mr. President, does anyone believe that the Irish vote is going to be fooled by such nonsense as that? I am sorry to see the United States Senate playing such politics. What can be thought about it by the world? Are we to place upon this treaty a reservation which will require a sovereign country to allow any part of that country to have self-determination and secede? What would we have thought of that doctrine in 1861? What would we think about it now? Of course, it does not need argument, but why should the Senate spend hours in serious consideration of such a proposition?

It is time that we stop our nonsense. We are not only making the Senate ridiculous before the people of the country but before the people of the world. Why not vote upon these propositions? If anybody conscientiously can not vote for the treaty, let him vote against it. Of that there can be no complaint.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Let those who want to vote for it vote for it, but do not let us descend to such politics as this. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator. I do not at all dissent from the Senator's view. I am quite in accord with his idea that we are wasting time here and that we ought not even to take the time to discuss these propositions. I suggest to the Senator that he move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will move to lay it on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does that carry the original proposition with it?

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to lay the Owen amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Minnesota state what amendment he proposes to lay on the table?

Mr. KELLOGG. The original amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment that is pending, of course, is the one that will have to be acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay on the table the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. FLETCHER. I stated that, of course——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Ball	Glass	McLean	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Gronna	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hale	Moses	Smoot

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask that the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table be stated. I want to know the form in which the motion was made by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the motion. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay on the table the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that when there is a motion pending followed by a motion to amend, a motion can not be made to lay the original motion on the table; that the motion to lay on the table must be directed to the pending motion, which is a motion to amend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds upon examination of the precedents upon that question that the Senate has ruled that a motion of that kind can be made.

Mr. REED. If that is the ruling of the Chair, I do not desire to urge the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair refers to an instance occurring in the Senate on January 16, 1891. The Chair quotes from Gilfry's Precedents the following proceedings on that occasion:

The Senate had under consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill (H. R. 11045) "to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States and to provide for the more efficient enforcement of such laws, and for other purposes."

The question recurring on an amendment proposed by Mr. Butler to the part proposed to be inserted by the amendment of the committee, viz: At the end of line 107, page 104, insert:

"Provided, That the supervisors, canvassers, and all the election officers shall be regarded as ministerial and not as judicial officers."

On motion by Mr. Harris to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following: "And shall perform none other than ministerial duties."

After debate, on motion by Mr. Hoar that the amendment of Mr. Butler lie on the table—

Just such a question of order as is now raised by the Senator from Missouri—

Mr. Gorman raised a question of order, viz, that the question pending was the amendment proposed by Mr. Harris to the amendment of Mr. Butler, and that it was not in order to lay both amendments on the table by one motion.

The Vice President (Mr. Morton) overruled the question of order, and decided that the motion to lay the amendment of Mr. Butler on the table carried with it the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. Harris and was in order.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. Gorman appealed to the Senate, and proceeded to debate the question of the appeal, when Mr. Edmunds made the point of order, viz, that the original motion being a nondebatable motion, an appeal from the decision of the Chair on the question was also nondebatable.

The Vice President sustained the point of order and decided that the appeal was not debatable; and on the question, Shall the decision of the Chair on the question of order raised by Mr. Gorman stand as the judgment of the Senate? it was determined in the affirmative; yeas 31, nays 15. So the Chair was sustained. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 51st Cong., 2d sess., pp. 1431–1433.)

In accordance with the precedent thus established the Chair feels constrained to overrule the point of order made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be in order to move as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay the amendment on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that such a motion would not be in order.

Mr. OWEN. Then the parliamentary proceeding, as I understand, is that if this motion be adopted by the Senate it disposes of the entire question, otherwise a motion would be in order to lay on the table the amendment. In that event I wish to offer such a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the motion of the Senator from Minnesota prevails, it will carry with it to the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I understand that he is absent to-day on account of sickness. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day. On this question I vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a pair for this day with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "yea" on this motion. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], and I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. Referring to the announcement that I made a moment ago, I transfer my general pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. He has not voted. I therefore transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and I will let my vote stand.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate on official business. If present he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 21, as follows:

So Mr. OWEN's reservation was laid on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senate has just listened to a remarkable lecture by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], in which with great earnestness he asserted that the Senate is engaged in a ridiculous piece of business.

The amendment which was offered to the reservation by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was intended to be ironical; I take it there is no question about that; but let us for a moment see what the "ridiculous" proposition before the Senate really was.

The reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] was merely this:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in article 6 of the treaty to have been merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I addressed my remarks more particularly to the amendment which I read in relation to granting independence to the republic of Ireland, the Kingdom of Korea, and so forth. Those amendments were the ones to which I more particularly addressed my remarks.

Mr. REED. But the Senator moved to lay the entire proposition on the table.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did.

Mr. REED. He did not move to lay on the table the particular amendments to which he is now referring, and he succeeded in laying upon the table the entire proposition. Now, I think no one can successfully contend that the resolution as offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is ridiculous, or that it is not germane to this treaty, for it merely refers to a clause of the treaty and states the construction which the United States puts upon that clause. To that reservation an amendment was offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], declaring that the principle of self-determination ought to be extended to Ireland. The Senator probably thinks that is ridiculous; at least, he made a motion to carry it to the table. To that reservation the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] had offered an amendment which included Korea. Possibly that is ridiculous; but if these reservations are ridiculous, then an important argument that has been made for this treaty is ridiculous.

We were asked to go into it on the ground that it was going to produce a general world equity; that the hand of the oppressor was no longer to be upon the throat of the oppressed; that small peoples were no more to be deprived of their liberties simply because some great nation was powerful enough to take their liberties from them. The principle was to be applied to the British Empire and to Japan just the same as to other nations. Two-thirds of the people of the United States still believe the League of Nations will insure the blessings of self-determination and liberty to the oppressed peoples of the earth.

Possibly that proposition is foolish—it may be chimerical—but it is the exact plan the President of the United States took with him to Paris. If it is ridiculous, he is the author of the absurdity; and you will see the Senator from Minnesota on the hustings next fall declaring to his constituency, in substance and effect, "This great document has liberated the world."

Moreover, you will hear all the rest of the advocates of this league asserting the same thing.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] on yesterday put into the RECORD the proposition President Wilson took with him to Paris. I want to read it, because I propose to offer the President's original proposition as a reservation to the league covenant. The proposition was:

ARTICLE 3.

The contracting powers unite in guaranteeing to each other political independence and territorial integrity, but it is understood between them that such territorial readjustments, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations or present social and political relationships, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may, in the judgment of three-fourths of the delegates, be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the peoples concerned, may be effected if agreeable to those peoples, and that territorial changes may in equity involve material compensation. The contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.

Mr. President, those words meant something or they meant nothing. If they meant anything, the League of Nations was to guarantee to all oppressed peoples an opportunity to secure their liberty. They were to be permitted as of right an appeal to the League of Nations, whereupon a three-fourths vote would result in their liberation. This guaranty applied not to past situations alone, but to present and future conditions.

Now, Mr. President, I am sending to the desk a reservation which literally follows the language the President employed, in so far as that language can be made applicable to the present state of the covenant. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The Secretary will read the proposed reservation.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

The United States construes part 1 of the treaty of peace with Germany, known as the covenant of the League of Nations, to the effect that such territorial readjustments, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations, or present social and political relationship, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may, in the judgment of three-fourths of the council or assembly, be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the people concerned may be effected if agreeable to those peoples. The high contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a word further in support of this reservation.

It is the doctrine which the President preached to this country before he went to Paris. It is the doctrine which he constantly supported in his speeches after he came from Paris. Abbreviated, it means that the people of any country, being held by the superior power of another country, may ask to be released, and may submit that question to the League of Nations, whereupon a three-fourths vote will work their liberation.

If the League of Nations means anything, if it is to bring any relief to the downtrodden, if it is not merely a great organization of power formed to control the world by force, if there is in it anywhere a germ of equity or a possibility of justice to the oppressed people of the world, then this reservation ought to be accepted.

If it is not accepted, then we have said to the people of the world that this thing we are setting up is a league of power, intended to guarantee the present possessions of the great empire nations of the world; that it is intended to rivet the chains upon Egypt, upon Korea, upon Ireland, upon all those weak peoples who at the time the treaty became effective were held in thralldom by some powerful member of the league.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if that is not exactly his construction of the league covenant, and has it not been from the very beginning?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I would like to ask the Senator how, in this reservation, there is an entirely opposite construction that he himself has given to the league covenant?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is a wonderful question to ask, is it not? I took the position that the league covenant does mean a league of power, and the Senator took the position that it did not mean that. Now, I am proposing to write into the covenant itself the meaning that you have ascribed to it, and you are going to oppose, you are on your feet now to oppose, a construction of this covenant which you have given it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator offers a construction which he himself says is not capable of being so construed.

Mr. REED. Oh, no. While we are making this contract we have a right by appropriate language to give it any meaning we desire. The Senator has the notion in his head, as have a good many other people, that this covenant having been delivered to us, we can not change it. He takes that position when I propose to change it or to affect it, but when he wants to change it or affect it he readily does so.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. There is no use in caviling about terms. We all understand what we are doing. Here is a proposition offered to the Senate. It is not, so far as we are concerned, a contract until we breathe the breath of life into it. Before we do that we have the right, if we want to do so, to strike out any part of it. We can refuse to concur in any part of it, or we can, adopting the form that has been employed here, offer a construction of it which we say to the world we will insist upon.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. I hold that the covenant as now drawn is a covenant of power and force; that it does not now secure to the people of other lands the right of self-determination. The Senator states that it does give to the people these rights.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator must not misquote me.

Mr. REED. Then, the Senator takes the position I do, that it is a league of force, of power, that it is an institution to rivet the chains upon the people. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. LENROOT. So far as territorial integrity is concerned, that it true; and that is why I have been insisting upon the reservations that we do not participate in any such power.

Mr. REED. Very well. Then the Senator ought to support my reservation——

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. REED. Because it is along that line of thought. It not only saves us from participation in a wrong, but makes possible the righting of the wrong.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator whether any Senator on either side of the aisle has at any time during the consideration of this treaty given the construction to this covenant that he now proposes by his reservation?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there have been any number of speeches made here in the Senate to the effect that this treaty does not rivet chains upon people, that this treaty is not a great conspiracy of power, that it is a beneficent thing, devised for the purpose of uplifting humanity and of democratizing the world. I am astonished that the Senator questions the fact. Will the Senator claim that you can democratize the world by enslaving the world? If we are to have a League of Nations, then let us pass this reservation, thereby protesting in the name of the United States that somewhere in it there shall be found the power to give relief to a subject people against their oppressors. If the Senator wants a League of Nations that does not have that power in it, if he wants to rivet a strait-jacket on the world for all time, if he wants to say to all races and peoples now oppressed, "You can not secure your liberty except by war or by the voluntary consent of your oppressors," he ought to oppose this reservation.

But he ought to go to the people of his own State and say to them frankly, "At the close of this great war, England, France, Italy, and Japan gathered within their deadly embraces all parts of the world inhabited by helpless folk and forced their government upon them against their protest. We have devised a scheme called 'the League of Nations,' which makes it certain they shall wear their chains forever; that the hand of the oppressor shall never relax in its grip upon their throats. The immense power of the league is to be employed to guarantee their slavery shall be perpetual."

That is what the Senator now says the league covenant means. This reservation I have offered puts into the league covenant, so far as America can put it in, the proposition that there shall be a court to which the oppressed of the earth can come. What is illogical in such an offer?

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the Senator, then, willing that we create an international court, where the people of Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands may have their independence determined, regardless of the will of the people of the United States?

Mr. REED. Now, let me answer that. I am astonished that the Senator should advance such an argument, because, save for the statement made by him a moment ago, he has professed to be the advocate of altruism. His question embraces an argument, but it is not the argument of the altruist. It is not the argument of the idealist. It is not the argument that has hitherto been put forth by those who champion the league. It is the century-old argument of selfishness. It was made by the commanders of Rome's conquering legions, by Darius, by Xerxes, by Cambyses, by Hannibal, and by Napoleon. It is the argument of the pirate that—

> They shall take who have the power;
> They shall keep who can.

You now appeal to the selfishness of the United States, and at the same time you proclaim that you are engaged in an altruistic movement for the general benefit of the world. You can not run in two directions at the same time. But I will answer the question in another way, the way I think it should be answered.

I am opposed to the Government of the United States trying to govern in the affairs of Europe. The Senator is in favor of it when he favors the league.

I am opposed to the United States interfering in the affairs of Asia. The Senator is in favor of it when he favors the league.

I am opposed to any international supergovernment. The Senator is in favor of it when he favors the league.

I am opposed to the United States violating that part of the Monroe doctrine which expressly declared that the United States would not interfere in the affairs of trans-Atlantic nations. The Senator is in favor of violating the Monroe doctrine, because he proposes to set up a league that does interfere with the affairs of the Old World, and he would make us a party to that league.

That is my position. But if we are to be forced into this compact by the votes of those Senators who favor internationalism above nationalism, who see fit to abandon our ancient policies, who turn their backs upon the teachings of the fathers, who insist that we shall run the ship of state into seas tossed by the tempests of European and Asiatic passions and hatreds—if we are going to steer such a course, then, at least, I want to accomplish some good as the result of so great a sacrifice. Accordingly, I hope that we may assure to the oppressed people of the earth an opportunity to have their wrongs righted. I am the more insistent upon this because by the league compact we make their continued slavery certain unless we afford the means of escape, and because if not given some tribunal to which they may peacefully appeal they will ultimately rise and fight for their liberty, and then the United States will be bound morally, even under the reservations adopted, to cast its influence against them when they venture to strike for liberty.

What is illogical about that position?

Mr. LENROOT. Then I do understand that the Senator favors placing in the League of Nations the control of Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and the Philippines?

Mr. REED. Certainly, Mr. President; if we go into the league, I am willing to put them in with the rest of the possessions of the world——

Mr. LENROOT. I am not.

Mr. REED. But what is the Senator doing? The Senator is putting his Nation in, and he is declaiming here about putting in Hawaii. He is willing to put the United States in, but he is worried about the Philippines. He is willing to put the United States in, but he is greatly disturbed about the Virgin Islands.

He is setting up a world government and surrendering to it in important matters the sovereignty of the entire United States, but he is distressed lest we should by that world government be deprived of a few unimportant islands. The Senator voted against a reservation which provided that we would withhold from the jurisdiction of the league questions involving its vital interests and the national honor of the United States. Did not the Senator so vote?

Mr. LENROOT. I did.

Mr. REED. Very well. The Senator is willing to vote to submit to this League of Nations questions involving the life of the United States, for that is what "vital interests" means, but he is greatly worried and distressed about Hawaii and the Virgin Islands and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Would not that reservation which the Senator now advocates have kept out from any jurisdiction of the league the very things he is now trying to put into it?

Mr. REED. The one I now offer?

Mr. LENROOT. No; the one about vital interests and the national honor.

Mr. REED. If we had excepted our vital interests and our national honor, we might have said that we would refuse to submit to the League of Nations the question of the control of Porto Rico, because we might have said it was a military outpost or could be made a military outpost for the defense of this country. Of course, we might have so said, and if we had we would have said an American thing; we would have announced an American doctrine.

Mr. LENROOT. But the reservation which the Senator now proposes would have taken those questions out of the reservation that the Senator formerly proposed and would have submitted it to this league.

Mr. REED. Yes; and it was not accepted.

Mr. LENROOT. It was not.

Mr. REED. It was defeated, and the Senator helped to defeat it.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. If I can not save the whole I want to save a part.

Mr. LENROOT. No; if the Senator can not save the whole he wants to put into the jurisdiction of the league the very things that a short time ago he was trying to keep out.

Mr. REED. Here is the difference. The league now has jurisdiction to decide questions involving our national honor and vital interests. The league is now also the instrument that is to be employed to rivet the chains on subject people. I am seeking to give such people the poor right to appeal to the league to break their chains. I am giving the league a chance to escape from the brutal contract it is now proposed to make.

Mr. LENROOT. Including the Philippines and Hawaii?

Mr. REED. Including the Philippines and Hawaii; so that if the League of Nations undertakes jurisdiction over all the world and over our national life and death, it can at least release subject peoples. We are holding no subjects, a fact the Senator very well knows. We are granting liberty to the Philippines as rapidly as possible. But, sir, if we have subjects, I am in favor of releasing them.

If this reservation is passed, then three-fourths of the league could by vote release Egypt. If you do not release Egypt and other subject countries, you men who have declared that this league means eternal peace know that it will ultimately bring war. The day will come when the nations and races now held in subjection will rise against their oppressors.

I can not understand the position of a man who is willing to submit the national honor and vital interests of the United States to the League of Nations, and yet is frightened lest the league may release the people of the Virgin Islands or even Ireland. Does not the Senator know that several of the bloody European wars have been caused or contributed to by the century-old conflict between Ireland and England?

This much is certainly true, that if you are to follow the lead of the President, the ideas of the President, the thought he had in mind when he went to France, you must accept this reservation. If the President was wrong about it, if he was wrong about the principle of self-determination, if it is wrong to give to this tribunal the right to release people, then it is wrong to set up the league to control the nations of the world.

Mr. President, the President has delivered many speeches in favor of the self-determination of peoples and in general support of the doctrine laid down in the reservation I have offered. I ask the privilege of hereafter inserting them in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Suggesting the absence of a quorum, Mr. President, I have concluded my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Lodge	Smoot

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] formally offered the reservation of which he was speaking.

Mr. REED. I did.

Mr. NORRIS. Then that reservation is the pending question?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Missouri has two reservations.

Mr. REED. I did not offer the printed one.

Mr. THOMAS. They are both printed.

Mr. REED. I have offered another reservation.

Mr. NORRIS. I think, probably, I might as well take this occasion to refer to what I believe to be the parliamentary situation in regard to the Egyptian reservation. I assume that the Egyptian reservation, having been laid on the table, it would not be in order to offer it in the form in which it was previously pending, although I feel confident that a great many Senators voted to lay it on the table because of the amendments which were attached to it. I desire at the proper time, when the pending matter is disposed of or some time later before we get through with the reservations, to offer another reservation, and, for the benefit of the Senate, I should like to have the Secretary read it and have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

The United States withholds its assent to article 147 of the treaty in so far as recognition of the said protectorate is extended beyond the going into force of this treaty.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I want to give notice to the Senator from Nebraska that I shall raise the point of order against the reservation when he offers it.

Mr. NORRIS. My own idea is that the point of order will not lie. Of course, I do not believe that it follows that because one reservation has been laid on the table another on the same subject can not be offered. In case the Senate shall decide otherwise, however, I want to give notice that unless some other Senator does so, when we shall get into the Senate, I shall reoffer the original reservation, which I believe would be in order at that time. I have no doubt that the reservation I have presented would be in order at any time when there is no other question pending.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with reference to the pending reservation offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] I wish to say that the Senator from Missouri, always eloquent and usually logical, has taken a position to-day exactly contrary to the position that he has maintained in many eloquent speeches throughout this long treaty debate. He has always construed the treaty in exactly opposite terms from the construction that he now proposes to give it in the pending reservation. I do no know of a Senator on either side of the aisle who has ever given the construction to the treaty that the Senator from Missouri now proposes to give it. The Senator must either abandon all of the contentions that he has made in the past with reference to the proper construction of the treaty or else he must vote against his own reservation that he has now proposed. Indeed, I do not see how any man anywhere could possibly give the construction to the treaty that the Senator from Missouri purports to give to it by this reservation.

After a recital as to oppressed peoples, and so forth, his reservation provides that "such territorial readjustments as may in the judgment of three-fourths of the council or assembly be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the people concerned may be effected if agreeable to those people."

I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri where he finds in the league covenant any right to reach final decisions upon any question by a vote of three-fourths of the council or the assembly?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin takes a different view of a constructive reservation from that which I take. These reservations are intended to express our construction of the covenant; they are not expected to be legal constructions.

Mr. LENROOT. That is what the Senator says in his reservation.

Mr. REED. Certainly. We, as a Senate, in agreeing to this treaty say that we are going to agree to it with certain constructions which we are putting upon it now. The Senator has voted for reservation after reservation that puts into the treaty things that are not there or gives it a construction which nullifies the plain propositions of the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. The Senator from Missouri must not put me in that position, because it is not true.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator from Wisconsin not vote for all of the Lodge reservations?

Mr. LENROOT. I did; but there is not one of the Lodge reservations that either puts anything into the treaty or gives the treaty a different construction.

Mr. REED. Do they take anything out of the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. They do not.

Mr. REED. Then those reservations do not do anything to the treaty, do they?

Mr. LENROOT. By the Lodge reservations we state that we do not assent to portions of the treaty that would impose certain obligations upon us; that is all.

Mr. REED. We say it in the form that we do not assent——

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. And that we construe the treaty to mean——

Mr. LENROOT. No; not construe. We agree upon the construction.

Mr. REED. Very well; I shall answer that in a moment.

Mr. LENROOT. For instance, there is no difference between the Senator from Missouri and myself upon the construction of article 10; I give it the same construction that he does, but by the reservation which has been adopted by the Senate we say we are not obligated; we do not assume the obligation that is imposed by article 10. There is no difference of opinion, however, upon the construction of that article between the Senator from Missouri and myself. If the Senator from Missouri does not mean a legal construction, he ought not to say so. There is no better lawyer in the Senate than the Senator from Missouri, and yet he assumes to construe this treaty in a manner that he himself says it is not capable of being construed.

Mr. President, another position that the Senator has taken is——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator let me answer him upon the point that he has just raised?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. Reservation No. 1 of the Lodge reservation provides:

The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge—

And so forth.

The Senator does not intend to say that that right is written in the league now?

Mr. LENROOT. I do; it is a matter of construction.

Mr. REED. Oh, pshaw!

Mr. LENROOT. Why, the Senator will not argue with me that that provision of the treaty is not susceptible of two constructions—one that the United States itself may determine the matter and the other that the league may do so—but the treaty is silent upon that subject, and we give the construction that the United States shall be the one to decide.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator vote for this reservation?—

The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States, by act or joint resolution of Congress, approves such regulation or interference.

Does the Senator say that is a matter of construction?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and I think the Senator will agree with me that it is.

Mr. REED. Or is it a matter of writing in an independent construction?

Mr. LENROOT. It is a matter of construction. I am sure the Senator will not disagree with me upon that if he will recall the provisions with regard to the reparation commission.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that this was in the treaty all the time?—

The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing in the United States or in countries other than that violating said article 16, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the treaty provides that under article 16 in case of an economic boycott the boycott shall lie against all nationals whether residing in the covenant-breaking country or elsewhere. We only assume that part of the obligation under article 16 by this reservation that relates to nationals residing within the covenant-breaking country. That is a matter of construction.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, that is not what it says. It says that "the United States understands." Now, the language was plain——

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator read "the United States reserves."

Mr. REED. No; "the United States understands."

Mr. LENROOT. Read along.

Mr. REED. I am reading:

The United States understands that the reparation commission——

Mr. LENROOT. I am not speaking of the reparation commission.

Mr. REED (reading:)

Will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator must be fair with me. He read that reservation, and I said to him that that was a construction, and I challenged him to disagree with me. He read the next reservation, and I told him in reply that that was a reservation of the obligation imposed by article 16.

Mr. REED. Exactly. I inadvertently read reservation 8 instead of reservation 9, the second time. The second one is reservation 9, which reads:

The United States shall not be obligated to contribute—

And so forth. Now, the United States is obligated to contribute by the express terms of the league, is it not?

Mr. LENROOT. If we assent to it.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If we assent to it without the reservation.

Mr. REED. Now, if we put in the reservation, we are changing the terms of the league, are we not?

Mr. LENROOT. No; certainly not. I am sure the Senator from Missouri must understand that where there is a provision that imposes an obligation upon us, and we say that we enter the league but do not assume the obligation, we have not assented to that part of the treaty that imposes the obligation. We have not changed the treaty in any way. We have merely not become a party to that part of it.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to invite the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the further fact that with respect to the reparations provision, and one or two others, those who are the strongest advocates of the league have conceded that it did not impose any obligations upon the signatories to the league that would interfere with their domestic affairs, and the question of tariff and exports would be a domestic affair; so that the Senator can plant himself properly upon the proposition which he did, and, further, upon the interpretation to which I have just referred.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is not a question of exports or imports in the ordinary sense at all. This reservation is dealing with the relations of the United States and of other Governments with the nationals of a country that is at war. It has to do with war, and it is not a domestic question, and it is not reserved as a domestic question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will further pardon me——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. What I referred to was the question of reparations, and I mention the reservation in regard to reparations, and the functions of the commission that have charge of the reparations will have to do with the trade between the United States and Germany, and that will involve imports and exports. I again insist that that is a domestic question.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, upon the question of the reparation commission, everyone has admitted that there was grave doubt as to whether the reparation commission would have any control over commerce. We have so construed the treaty that they shall not have without the consent of Congress; that is all. It is a construction. Every one of these 14 reservations that has heretofore been adopted has either been a construction of the articles of the treaty or has reserved the United States from obligations imposed by the treaty. There is not one of the reservations that purports to give to the treaty a construction exactly contrary to what the author himself says is the proper construction of the treaty.

Further, Mr. President, it certainly must be surprising to Senators, after the many eloquent speeches that the Senator from Missouri has made concerning the protection of the rights of the United States and voting for these reservations as he has in order to protect the rights of the United States, that he now comes with a reservation that would repose in the League of Nations control over the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and possibly Alaska; and the Senator from Missouri now says that all that he has been saying for these many, many months concerning the protection of the United States he does not mean now, and he wants to surrender to the League of Nations these vital interests of the United States which in a reservation a short time ago he sought to protect.

Mr. President, I understand, of course, that the Senator is bent upon defeating this treaty; and, of course, the Senator understands that if this reservation of his should be adopted there is none of us that could vote to ratify the treaty with that reservation. There is none of us that would vote to surrender the vital interests of the United States as the Senator from Missouri proposes to surrender them in this so-called reservation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, then why does not the Senator support my reservation, which expressly reserves to the sole jurisdiction of the United States questions of its vital interests and national honor?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, Mr. President, what a position for the Senator to take! He says that because I and other Senators did not support his reservation he now wants to surrender the interests of the United States that he says he sought to protect by that reservation. Oh, what a position for the Senator to place himself in!

Mr. President, we have been debating this matter for a long time. The Senator from Missouri occupied much more time than I did. It must be plain to every Senator that if this reservation is adopted it will defeat the treaty, and I therefore move to lay it on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—well, of course, if the Senator makes that motion at the conclusion of his own speech, and tries to shut off a reply, there is no way to stop it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin moves to lay on the table the reservation of the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. REED and Mr. LENROOT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], who is absent on account of sickness. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Noting the absence of my general pair, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent from the Senate on account of official business, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). On account of the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who is absent. In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained on official business. If present he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announcet the following pairs:

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

So Mr. REED's reservation was laid on the table.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer the following reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed reservation.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6, article 147, of the treaty to have been merely a temporary measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I raise a point of order against the reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. I do not know of any specific rule adopted by the Senate that would preclude the offering of this reservation, but the general rules under which we operate, as laid down in Jefferson's Manual, and all parliamentary procedure, as I understand it, would forbid the offering of a matter that had been disposed of. The Senator from Oklahoma offered a reservation a day or two ago which reads——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair understands that the Senator from Utah is simply stating a point of order.

Mr. KING. I am stating a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the Senator a question pertaining to his point of order.

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator realizes the peculiar parliamentary situation that existed at the time the motion to lay on the table was made. Personally I believe that the Senator's point of order is good, because the Senator from Oklahoma has worded this reservation practically the same as the other; but I appeal to the Senator from Utah to permit unanimous consent to be given for the Senator from Oklahoma to offer the reservation, and let us vote on it at once. It was not fair the way it was done before, and I ask the Senator from Utah to allow this course to be taken.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a point of order is never debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable unless the Chair desires to hear debate on it.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I assumed the Chair did not want to hear debate on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is quite ready to rule upon the point of order made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have such confidence in the Chair that I shall submit the question to him without another word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair there is no substantial difference between the two reservations, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Oklahoma may be permitted to offer the reservation.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection if it is understood that there shall be no debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Oklahoma shall be in order when he offers the reservation originally proposed. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. I object, unless it is understood that there will be no debate.

Mr. NORRIS. I will couple with the request for unanimous consent that the yeas and nays shall be ordered and immediately taken.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is now added to the request for unanimous consent that it be determined without debate and upon the yeas and nays. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will add to his request the further condition that any amendment to the reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma may be voted upon without debate?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not suppose there would be any amendment to it. I do not want to get into the same parliamentary snarl that we got into before.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer now the reservation that I sent to the Clerk's desk a while ago, which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the reservation proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

The United States withholds its assent to article 147 of the treaty in so far as recognition of the said protectorate is extended beyond the going into force of this treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I raise the point of order against the reservation just offered by the Senator from Nebraska that it is exactly the same reservation which was heretofore offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, it is not substantially the same, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and in his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KIRBY (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). My colleague, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is absent on official business. He is paired on this question with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, on business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair that I did before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on business of the Senate.

Mr. McLEAN. I have a pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to have the RECORD show that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is absent on public business, and that if he had been present he would have voted "yea" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Ashurst	Gronna	Lodge	Reed
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Trammell
Brandegee	Kenyon	Owen	Walsh, Mass.

So Mr. NORRIS's reservation was rejected.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wanted to offer the amendment to which I referred some time ago in speaking to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I yield for that purpose if somebody will not instantly move to lay it on the table, so that I may not have a few moments to speak.

Mr. OWEN. I offer the following reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following reservation, which will be read:

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

That the United States in ratifying the covenant of the League of Nations does not intend to be understood as modifying in any degree the obligations entered into by the United States and the Entente Allies in the agreement of November 5, 1918, upon which as a basis the German Empire laid down its arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, nothing can be of more concern to the American people in these days than the views of the numerous candidates for the Presidency. There seems to be something about the candidacy for the Presidency that has a tendency to produce what we might call compromise talk; that is to say, not absolutely either for or against any particular proposition for fear of what the public sentiment may be over in the next State. We have candidates who are for the league but against entangling alliances; for the league but against surrendering our traditional policies; for the league but against meddling in European affairs; and with these straddling and inconsistent planks in their platforms are running for President. Therefore when we find gentlemen who are candidates or whose names are prominently mentioned, with pronounced views upon public questions, it is wholesome for us to consider them.

To that end I desire to read three paragraphs from a most remarkable letter which appears this morning over the name of Mr. Hoover. I have taken occasion heretofore to say that there is no man, perhaps, who is better fitted to diagnose the situation in Europe than Mr. Hoover, a man of great ability, of great experience, who for the last 20 years has spent a great deal of time in Europe and for the last 2 or 3 years practically all his time. He may be considered in a sense an expert upon this subject.

This letter is under date of April 11, 1918, and is addressed to the President of the United States. I will insert the entire letter in the RECORD before I sit down, in order that Mr. Hoover's statement may go in its fullness before the Nation, but I will not take the time of the Senate to read it all. One paragraph reads:

Fifth. I am convinced that there has grown up since the armistice the policy—perhaps unconscious but nevertheless effective—of dragging the United States into every political and economic question in Europe, and constantly endeavoring to secure pledges of economic and political support from us in return for our agreeing to matters which we consider for their common good, where we have no interest, and constantly using us as a stalking horse, economically and politically, solely in the interests of internal political groups within the allied Governments. These objectives and interests may be perfectly justified from their point of view, but it forces us into violations of our every instinct and into situations that our own people will never stand. For instance, I don't see how we can remain in these enforcement commissions unless we participate in the military enforcement, with its enormous cost and risk; and the tendency will always be to exact the political objectives, with the military strength of the United States as a background.

One hardly gathers the import of that statement from a single reading of it. It is an infinitely stronger indictment against this program than it has been within the ability of the so-called irreconcilables to make, for it is a statement made on the ground and from personal contact with the situation. It is the deliberate judgment, communicated in private to the President of the United States, of a man whose business it was and has been to study the conditions in Europe for the last several years, and who at that time could certainly have had no other purpose than that of advising the Commander in Chief according to the exact facts as he saw them. When you read that in the light of what has transpired since, when you read that in the light of the Adriatic correspondence, when you read that in the light of what is taking place now in Europe, it amounts almost to prophecy. It is at least a correct reading of economic conditions translated into the actual facts of the future.

I am informed that there are explanations out for this letter, and I have no doubt there are. They ought to have preceded the letter. Another paragraph reads:

Sixth. I have the feeling that revolution in Europe is by no means over. The social wrongs in these countries are far from solution, and the tempest must blow itself out, probably with enormous violence. Our people are not prepared for us to undertake the military policing of Europe while it boils out its social wrongs. I have no doubt that if we could undertake to police the world and had the wisdom of statesmanship to see its gradual social evolution, that we would be making a great contribution to civilization; but I am certain that the American people are not prepared for any such a measure, and I am also sure that if we remain in Europe with military force, tied in an alliance which we have never undertaken, we should be forced into this storm of repression of revolution and forced in under terms of coordination with other people that would make our independence of action wholly impossible.

Of course, Mr. President, that must inevitably be true. If we take up the European program and undertake to deal with the European situation we must inevitably be forced to adopt principles concerning it which are inimical or which are at war with our entire theory of government and civilization. How many things are written into this treaty and how many things are to transpire under the treaty which are at war with every sentiment and principle of the American people? How many things are written in this treaty and how many things are to transpire under the treaty which, if it were to come to the United States individually and alone, we would resent even having presented to us?

Seventh. It grows upon me daily that the United States is the one great moral reserve in the world to-day, and that we can not maintain that independence of action through which this reserve is to be maintained if we allow ourselves to be dragged into detailed European entaglements over a period of years. In my view, if the Allies can be brought to adopt peace on the basis of the 14 points, we should retire from Europe, lock, stock, and barrel, and we should lend to the whole world our economic and moral strength, or the world will swim in a sea of misery and disaster worse than the dark ages. If they can not be brought to accept peace on this basis our national honor is at stake, and we should have to make peace independently and retire. I know of nothing, in letter or spirit, of any statement of your own, or in the 14 points, that directly or indirectly ties the United States to carry on this war through the phase of enforcement or the multitudinous demands and intrigues of a great number of other Governments and their officials. It does appear to me that your conception of the League of Nations was with view to the provision of a dominant court, where these difficulties could be thrashed out, and if we sit as one of the prosecutors the court will have no judge.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the entire letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TEXT OF MR. HOOVER'S LETTER.

APRIL 11, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Your economic group has had before it the question of whether the United States should continue membership in the various commissions set up under the peace treaty. I should like to lay before you my own views on this subject.

I feel strongly that any continuation of the United States in such an allied relationship can only lead to vast difficulty and would militate against the efficiency of the League of Nations. My reasons are as follows:

First. These commissions are primarily to secure the enforcement of reparation and other conditions imposed upon the Central Empires. As the United States is not calling for any form of reparation that requires continued enforcement, our presence on these commissions would appear to be for one of the following purposes:

(a) To give moral and political support to the allied Governments in measures generally for their benefit. It can not be conceived that in the prostrate condition of the enemy that the Allies will require any physical assistance to the enforcement of their demands. In this event, the United States will be lending itself to the political and financial interests of other Governments during peace, a situation that must be entirely repulsive to our national interests, traditions, and ideals.

(b) Another objective might be that we should remain in these commissions with a view to securing justice and moderation in the demands of the Allies against the Central Empires. We would thus be thrust into the repulsive position of the defender of our late enemy, in order to secure what we would conceive to be constructive and statesmanlike rehabilitation in Europe. Our experience during the last three months has shown us bitterly that we thus subject ourselves to complaint and attack from the allied Governments, and such a continued relationship should only breed the most acute international friction.

Second. If our experience in the last four months counts for anything, the practical result always is that the allied governments, knowing our disposition, necessarily ask for more than they expect to get, and that we find ourselves psychologically, and, in fact, politically, on the side of the enemy in these negotiations, and in a constant desire to find practical working formula we are frequently forced to abandon some measure of what we consider sane statesmanship. The continuation of this relationship will bind us for a long period of years to a succession of compromises fundamentally at variance with our national convictions. I am not attempting to dispute the righteousness of any allied demand, but merely to set up the fact that our viewpoint is so essentially different. One other practical result of our experience already is that the Americans who sit on such commissions, if they do not acquiesce and assist in enforcing any propositions from various government officials, become immediately and personally subject to attack as being inimical to their interests and with the powerful engines of propaganda which they employ in Europe and our own country no such man can endure for long. These governments, if they were faced with the sole responsibility for their actions, would not attempt the measures which they seek under our protection.

Therefore, for all reasons, I do not see that we can effect any real justice in these matters.

Third. If we continue to sit in the enforcement of this peace we will be in effect participating in an armed alliance in Europe, where every change in the political wind will affect the action of these commissions. We will be obliged to participate in all European questions and we will be firmly tied definitely to one side, unless we precipitate a break and lend ourselves to the charge that we have been traitors to the "common cause."

Fourth. This whole matter has a very practical relationship to the League of Nations. If we can bring to an early end our whole relationship to these political combinations in Europe, which grew up before and during the war, and can lend our strength to the League of Nations, that body will gain a stability and importance which it could not otherwise attain. As the Central Empires and Russia will not be for some years admitted to the league, and if we continue in what is in effect an armed alliance in Europe dominating these empires, the league will become simply a few neutrals gyrating around this armed alliance. It will tend to drive the Central Empires and Russia into an independent league. If, on the other hand, we can again secure our independence we can make of the league that strong and independent court of appeal that will have authority.

Fifth. I am convinced that there has grown up since the armistice the policy—perhaps unconscious but nevertheless effective—of dragging the United States into every political and economic question in Europe, and constantly endeavoring to secure pledges of economic and political support from us in return for our agreeing to matters which we consider for their common good, where we have no interest, and constantly using us as a stalking horse, economically and politically, solely in the interests of internal political groups within the allied Governments. These objectives and interests may be perfectly justified from their point of view, but it forces us into violations of our every instinct and into situations that our own people will never stand. For instance, I do not see how we can remain in these enforcement commissions unless we participate in the military enforcement, with its enormous cost and risk; and the tendency will always be to exact the political objectives, with the military strength of the United States as a background.

Sixth. I have the feeling that revolution in Europe is by no means over. The social wrongs in these countries are far from solution and the tempest must blow itself out, probably with enormous violence. Our people are not prepared for us to undertake the military policing of Europe while it boils out its social wrongs. I have no doubt that if we could undertake to police the world and had the wisdom of statesmanship to see its gradual social evolution, that we would be making a great contribution to civilization; but I am certain that the American people are not prepared for any such a measure, and I am also sure that if we remain in Europe with military force, tied in an alliance which we have never undertaken, we should be forced into this storm of repression of revolution and forced in under terms of coordination with other people that would make our independence of action wholly impossible.

Seventh. It grows upon me daily that the United States is the one great moral reserve in the world to-day, and that we can not maintain that independence of action through which this reserve is to be maintained if we allow ourselves to be dragged into detailed European entanglements over a period of years. In my view, if the Allies can be brought to adopt peace on the basis of the 14 points, we should retire from Europe, lock, stock, and barrel, and we should lend to the whole world our economic and moral strength, or the world will swim in a sea of misery and disaster worse than the dark ages. If they can not be brought to accept peace on this basis our national honor is at stake, and we should have to make peace independently and retire. I know of nothing, in letter or spirit, of any statement of your own, or in the 14 points, that directly or indirectly ties the United States to carry on this war through the phase of enforcement or the multitudinous demands and intrigues of a great number of other Governments and their officials. It does appear to me that your conception of the League of Nations was with view to the provision of a dominant court, where these difficulties could be thrashed out, and if we sit as one of the prosecutors the court will have no judge.

Faithfully, yours, HERBERT HOOVER.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would the Senator be willing at the same point to insert the interview which Mr. Hoover has given out to-day referring to this letter?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I will be willing to take any explanation of any candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that it may be read at this time.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think I shall want to comment on it a little.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, March 17.

Herbert Hoover, in a statement here this afternoon, characterized publication of a memorandum he prepared during the peace conference, in which he warned against American participation in various international commissions, as "a breach of good taste."

The views expressed in the memorandum were "later modified as to the particular of our having a representative on the reparation commission," Hoover said.

"I have seen in some of this morning's papers a copy of a memorandum of mine that was prepared in the course of the peace conference on the subject of our participation in the large number of international commissions set up in Europe," the former Food Administrator said.

"As to the views expressed in the memorandum, they were later modified as to the particular of our having a representative on the reparation commission itself, because of the large economic control finally given to it over a great part of Europe, and the complete necessity of the United States to be represented thereon at once in order to protect American interests.

"Regardless of any personal point of view in this matter, there is to me nothing that is such a breach of good taste, or the very foundation of relations among Government officials, as for them to issue to the press correspondence that may have passed between them and their superiors in the course of their service, without approval on both sides. I am informed it was not issued from the White House. It is scarcely necessary for me to say it was not released by me, and that a searching inquiry in my office satisfies me that it has not come from my staff."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I sympathize with Mr. Hoover in his disappointment in not being told to keep it a secret, but nowhere in the explanation does he attempt to modify the points to which I have called attention. The fact that it has reached the public through means which may not be defensible does not differentiate it at all from many other things which have reached the public from the Versailles conference which were not intended for the public, but which after they were received by the public were enlightening. Will the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] be patient with me while I reread some of this, in view of the explanation which Mr. Hoover has made? While I know the Senator from Nebraska always acts with honor and sincerity, I am not sure whether he introduced that explanation as Mr. Hoover's friend or as his enemy. [Laughter.]

Now, let us see how much of this is explained.

I am convinced that there has grown up since the armistice a policy—perhaps unconscious but nevertheless effective—of dragging the United States into every political and economic question in Europe, and constantly endeavoring to secure pledges of economic and political support from us in return for our agreeing to matters which we consider for their common good, where we have no interest, and constantly using us as a stalking horse, economically and politically, solely in the interests of internal political groups within the allied Governments. These objectives and interests may be perfectly justified from their point of view, but it forces us into violations of our every instinct and into situations that our own people will never stand.

Mr. President, the fact has leaked out that that is the view of Mr. Hoover, the European expert, at the time when he was advising the President as to the situation. The explanation does nothing more than to condemn the processes by which that statement reached the American people; and the only objection, as I find it, in the explanation is as to the American people being permitted to know the facts; there is no explanation of the facts as stated by Mr. Hoover.

I ask those who are interested in this treaty to take the statement of Mr. Hoover upon the 11th day of April, 1919, and before they cast their votes to plunge the United States into this maelstrom of passion, of interest, and of selfishness, to read it and consider it. When you read it remember that it was not intended for anybody but his chief, and therefore must have been actuated by the most sincere motives. There was nothing on the outside, no political situation, nothing to modify his views, as they came to him in all sincerity and in deepest desire to know the facts.

Mr. President, I turn to another candidate. Mr. Bryan is to be here to-day or to-morrow to encourage and guide those Democratic friends who have decided to break away from the President and to insist upon the ratification of the treaty; and I think it pertinent to consider Mr. Bryan's view of the situation after he had had expert knowledge, gained as Secretary of State. If you will look upon the front page of the Commoner for July, 1915, you will find these views signed by W. J. Bryan:

Why should we add to our responsibility by undertaking to police Europe? Have we not quite enough to do to stand sponsor for the independence of our sister Republics? Our Nation is the dominant political influence in the Western Hemisphere; this is a fact which does not need to be asserted. But this Nation does not covet its neighbors' lands or its neighbors' prosperity or anything else that is its neighbors. The Latin-American Republics are not only self-governing, but they recognize the foundation principles of republican institutions, and they would assist the United States in repelling a transatlantic foe. * * * If we adhere to the ideals of the past and to the traditions of our Nation, we will seek to make the world better through the influence of high example. If we adhere to this policy we lead the world and we should be satisfied with our primacy. If, on the other hand, we are to revolutionize our methods, we must be content to follow at the rear end of the European procession.

They all get back, by force of logic and of facts, to the proposition that if we enter into this alliance and intermingle in the affairs of Europe we give up our leadership and take our place at the rear end as the guarantor of the European procession.

We can not take the lead if we join the European group, for leadership in that group requires the acceptance of the doctrine of conquest.

How true! When you think of the fact, Mr. President, that while the Versailles conference was sitting Great Britain reached out and took possession of Persia; when you think of the fact that since the armistice has been signed there has been more territory taken possession of by dominant nations and more subject peoples reduced to the sway of dominant powers in that period of time than ever happened in any 20 years in the history of Europe, you will understand what Mr. Bryan means when he says that we must accept "the doctrine of conquest."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator from what he is reading?

Mr. BORAH. I was reading a quotation from the Commoner.

Mr. THOMAS. Of what date?

Mr. BORAH. The article in the Commoner was of date of July, 1915:

We could at best be a poor second if we so changed our national policy as to become a part of a European police force. We would not be "one of the finest" on parade day—we would limp along apologetically, with downcast eyes and blushing cheeks.

No; the advocates of the European police force plan can not silence opposition with an intellectual frown; they can not dismiss their opponents with such epithets as "pacifist" and "nonresistant"—they must come out in the open and admit: First, that they are willing to repudiate the teachings of Washington.

And so we will have to admit. No reservation here protects the policy of Washington. You have, in so far as language can do so but not as a practical proposition, undertaken to protect the doctrine of Monroe; but no Senator offers a reservation, and no Senator will offer one to protect the policy of Washington, because the idea of a league and the policy of Washington are in eternal war. They can not be reconciled even by reservation.

Second, that they are ready to abandon the doctrines of Monroe; third, that they favor such an amendment of the Constitution as will transfer the power to declare war from Congress to the nations across the sea; and, fourth, that they are tired of being good, and hunger for the excitement of the camp and the man hunt.

Let the people understand the real purpose of the "league to enforce peace"— and not even the prestige of the deluded scholars who have cast in their lot with it can save it from the execrations of an indignant public.

How cruel to the President!

Mr. President, those are the only two that I care to refer to to-day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the able Senator from Idaho has attacked the treaty which is under discussion in numerous ways and from different standpoints. He has had pleasure in quoting from the statements of distinguished Americans, as well as conspicuous statesmen from overseas, where their views have been antagonistic to the covenant of the League of Nations. He has just regaled us with a statement attributed to Mr. Hoover and a quotation from Mr. Bryan's Commoner. The American people are always glad to obtain the views of men of standing and ability such as Mr. Hoover and Mr. Bryan. Whether the views of these great Americans will be controlling upon the Senate or will influence the opinions of Senators I will not presume to state. The subject before the Senate is of such momentous importance that Senators have no doubt appreciated the responsibility resting upon them and will determine upon their conscience the course each of them will pursue.

I have not seen the article from which the Senator has just read, and from the excerpts submitted by the Senator it is impossible for me to determine just what Mr. Hoover's views were when he made the statement credited to him, and, of course, from that statement, made over a year ago, it is impossible to determine what Mr. Hoover's attitude now is with respect to the treaty which is before us for ratification. I reached the conclusion from listening to what the Senator read that Mr. Hoover was presenting a brief or submitting an opinion against the United States participating in some of the commissions, particularly the reparation commission, for which provision is made in the treaty. I submit there would be nothing inconsistent in opposing the United States being represented upon the reparation commission and at the same time favoring the League of Nations and the fundamental principles upon which the covenant of the league is formed. As I now recall, the reparation commission is a thing separate and apart from the provisions of the covenant of the league.

But, Mr. President, I arose merely for the purpose of inviting attention to the statements of two distinguished Republicans. The Senator from Idaho, perhaps more than any other Member of the Senate, has invoked the memory of a great American, former President Roosevelt, and has in impassioned and eloquent terms, appealed to his influence for guidance in this important period of the world's history. We have listened with pleasure to the eulogies bestowed upon Col. Roosevelt and have joined in praise of his great services in behalf of his country. The views of Mr. Roosevelt upon any question attracted attention in his lifetime and receive earnest consideration now that he has passed to the great beyond.

I desire to read from an address delivered by ex-President Roosevelt on the occasion of the Lafayette day exercises held at the aldermanic chamber in New York City on September 6, 1918. It was an important occasion, and there were many distinguished persons in attendance, including representatives of leading nations of the earth. Hon. Victor J. Dowling was chairman of the meeting. Ambassador Jusserand, as well as many other distinguished Frenchmen were present to represent their country. Among the nations represented were Belgium, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Portugal, and Haiti. It is interesting to note that Prof. T. J. Massaryk, the president of the young Republic of Czechoslovakia, was present; and also, Ignace Paderewski, that great Pole, who has contributed so much to the establishment of the new Republic of Poland. Col. Roosevelt delivered a most forceful and stirring address. In the course of his remarks he said:

Of course, Lafayette Day commemorates the services rendered to America in the Revolution by France. I wish to insist with all possible emphasis that in the present war France, England, Italy—all the Allies—have rendered us similar services. The French at the Battle of the Marne four years ago and at Verdun, and the British at Ypres; in short, the French, the English, the Italians, the Belgians, the Serbians—all the Allies were fighting our battles exactly as much as they were fighting their own. Our Army on the other side is now repaying in part our debt, and next year we have every reason to hope, and we must insist, that the fighting army in France from the United States shall surpass in numbers the fighting army in France of either France or Britain. I hope they may smash the Hun as hard. It is now time, and it has long been time, for America to bear her full share of the common burden, the burden borne by all the Allies in the great fight for liberty and for justice.

Let me pause long enough to direct attention to the statement just read that France, England, Italy, and the other allies in their struggle against the Central Empires "rendered us similar services," and that the Allies "were fighting our battles exactly as much as they were fighting their own." Col. Roosevelt saw that the great contest was between the forces of absolutism and oppression, and those peoples who were contending for democracy and freedom and the reign of justice and righteousness. He further proceeded:

Let me make an interpolation. I every now and then meet one of those nice gentry in whom softness of heart has spread to the head, who say: "How can we guarantee that everybody will love one another at the end of the war?" The first step in guaranteeing it is to knock Germany out—that will guarantee it. The peace that we win must guarantee full reparation, as you have said, Mr. Chairman, for the awful cost of life and treasure which the Prussianized Germany of the Hohenzollerns has inflicted on the entire world; and this reparation must take the form of action that will render it impossible for Germany to repeat her colossal wrongdoing.

Germany has been able to wage this fight for world domination because she has subdued to her purpose her vassal allies, Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria. Serbia and Roumania must have restored to them what Bulgaria has taken from them. The Austrian and Turkish Empires must both be broken up, all the subject peoples liberated, and the Turk driven from Europe.

I pause to inquire how we, at the conclusion of the war and when peace had been won, "full reparation for the awful cost of life and treasure inflicted on the entire world," was to be secured. Obviously to guarantee full reparation would require supervision by the victorious nations. The only nations who were in a position to guarantee reparation would be the allied and associated powers. Mr. Roosevelt says that the "reparation must take the form of action" that will render it "impossible for Germany to repeat such collossal wrongdoing." Let me inquire what form of action could be taken to prevent a repetition by Germany of her military trespasses and warlike depredations. It is manifest that the only form of action possible was such as would result from the union of the victorious nations. No nation individually could enforce reparation or guarantee the results of the terms of peace. It seems to me that the words of the distinguished ex-President clearly indicated that he had in mind the fact that there must be a league or concert of nations to compel the different nations to submit to the terms of peace imposed upon them. Senators will also observe that Col. Roosevelt called attention to the fact that Serbia and Rumania had been despoiled of a portion of their possessions. According to his view restoration of such territory must be made.

The statesman of the type of President Roosevelt would know that only by a union of the victorious nations could this be accomplished. And he further states that the Austrian and Turkish Empires must be broken up and that subject peoples be liberated and the Turk driven from Europe. I pause to inquire what nations were to break the Austrian and Turkish Empires, and what nations were to liberate the subject peoples and to drive the Ottoman Turk from Europe? The subject peoples within the former boundaries of Austria and Turkey, by the terms of peace, would have no assurance that their liberties would be preserved, unless provision were made for their protection. What nations were to join in protecting the liberty of the peoples? Was the United States when the war ended to abandon Europe and the subject peoples who were to be liberated and the new nations that were to be constituted out of Germany and Austria? Col. Roosevelt does not say that our allies alone are to perform these tasks, nor does he intimate that the United States is to deny responsibility or decline to share in bearing the burdens which the days of peace would inevitably impose upon the victorious nations. Col. Roosevelt was no quitter. When he speaks of guaranteeing nations and liberating the submerged peoples, there can be no doubt but what he fully understood that this great Republic would be one of the guarantors and one of the protectors, and that it would do its part in common with the allied nations in meeting the heavy responsibilities that would immediately follow the ratification of the treaty of peace.

He further proceeds:

We do not intend that German or Maygar should be wronged by others or oppressed by others, but neither do we intend that they shall oppress and domineer over others. France, as you have said, Mr. Chairman, must receive back Alsace and Lorraine. We can not go into any peace conference where everybody did not accept that before we entered it. Belgium must be restored and indemnified.

Who is going to restore Belgium? How are you going to compel an indemnification of the claims of Belgium? Are we to scuttle out of Europe and leave to our allies the remedying of the wrongs which have been committed?

Obviously the great ex-President, whom the Senator from Idaho delights to follow, did not entertain the views to which the Senator from Idaho has given expression so often and so eloquently on the floor of the Senate.

But to proceed:

Italian Austria must be restored to Italy and Roumanian Hungary to Roumania. The heroic Czecho-Slovaks must be made into an independent Commonwealth, and the southern Slavs must be united in a great Jugo-Slav Commonwealth. Poland as a genuinely independent Commonwealth must receive back Austrian and Prussian Poland as well as Russian Poland, and have her coast line on the Baltic. Lithuania, Livonia, and Finland, and the Baltic Provinces must be guaranteed their freedom and independence—and when I speak of independence I mean independence of Germany as well as of Russia—and no part of the ancient Empire of Russia must be left under the German yoke or subject in any way to German influence, even the slightest. Northern Schleswig should go back to the Danes. Britain and Japan should keep the colonies they have conquered.

Mr. President, I think the records of the Senate will establish the fact that there was practical unanimity in this body during the period that the United States was in the war, that when the peace terms were written Poland and Czechoslovakia and Jugo-Slavia should be free and independent nations.

Col. Roosevelt, in the address from which I am reading, was but stating the sentiments of the American people. He was insisting that the national aspirations of millions of people who had been denied freedom by the autocratic nations with which we and the allied nations were at war should be recognized, and that these suffering and oppressed peoples should be freed from the yoke of bondage and be permitted to organize governments of their own. Col. Roosevelt, after enumerating some of the nations that must be established, says that they "must be guaranteed their freedom and independence * * * and that no part of the ancient Empire of Russia must be left under the German yoke."

I again inquire, Who is to guarantee these new nations their independence? Who is to aid and protect them during the trying days of their young lives? Even a novice in political questions would know that without adventitious aid these feeble nations that were to be created out of territory formerly belonging to the vanquished nations would require succor and guidance for an indefinite period.

It was clear even before the war was ended and at the time Col. Roosevelt spoke that with the termination of the conflict there would be unrest and, indeed, chaos in central Europe and in the defeated nations, and that only by the concerted efforts of the United States and the allied nations would peace be restored and stabilizing processes be permitted to operate.

Col. Roosevelt could see, as all sensible persons must have seen, that the freedom and independence of the peoples who were to be permitted to organize governments along national lines could only be realized if there were strong nations behind them. In other words, their security must be "guaranteed," not by the European nations alone, but by all of the victorious nations. Such a course would, of necessity, call for a league or concert of nations. It would require the most intimate relations and the closest cooperation. It would call for a league of nations, not only to protect the freed peoples, but to preserve the peace of the world.

And yet the distinguished Senator from Idaho and others professing to follow President Roosevelt have denounced the plan which was outlined by him in the great address from which I am reading:

Armenia must be free, Palestine made a Jewish state, and the Syrian Christians liberated.

I ask the Senator from Idaho how this program outlined by President Roosevelt is to be consummated if the program which he, as one of the leaders of the "battalion of death," is advocating should be successfully carried into execution? The purpose of the Senator from Idaho is to defeat the treaty, to have the United States scuttle out of Europe, to say to our Allies, "We joined with you in the war; our sons laid down their lives with your sons in defense of liberty and civilization; but now that the war is over we will leave you and place upon your shoulders the burdens of restoring peace and rehabilitating and protecting the nations into which we have breathed the breath of life."

But let me add, Mr. President, the war may not yet be ended. There are in Germany and Turkey and Russia the smoldering flames that may spring into life and sweep with devastating force European lands which have felt the tread of martial feet.

Even now Germany is in the grasp of military forces. The military spirit of Prussianism is not yet, it would seem, overthrown. There are open and potential dangers menacing Europe and the powers of the world.

If we withdraw to-day, no one can predict with certainty that we may not within a short time be required to again unsheath the sword. Can it be said that the task which we set our hands to perform is now finished? Are our obligations fully discharged?

It seems manifest that Col. Roosevelt felt that there would be duties and responsibilities resting upon this Nation after the war was ended.

Mr. President, would it not be cowardly for us to pursue the policy which has been suggested by some who have so vigorously fought the pending treaty? Would it not be cowardly for the United States to turn Europe adrift, to withdraw from participation in the post-war problems that now press for solution, to leave Poland and the new nations which we helped to create and whose hands are outstretched for aid and protection?

But, Mr. President, that is not all that President Roosevelt said upon the question of our duty and of a League of Nations.

Mr. BORAH. I have not heard anything in that about a League of Nations.

Mr. KING. It is obvious, Mr. President, that there could not be accomplished what President Roosevelt indicates here should be accomplished without a concert of the nations, whether you call it a league or concert of the nations, or an organization to enforce the peace of the world.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, the Senator is reading the deceased President's views with his comments, and by his comments he connects them with the League of Nations, as I understand.

Mr. KING. I read what ex-President Roosevelt said. The inference, I insist, is clear from his words that there should be a concert of at least the allied and associated nations who were engaged in the war for the purpose of guaranteeing the fruits of the war and to preserve peace. When Col. Roosevelt spoke about guaranteeing the freedom and independence of nations and the liberating influences or control upon the part of Germany or Russia, there is only one conclusion to be drawn from the statement, namely, that there should be joint action upon the part of the victorious nation to accomplish the indicated ends. When he speaks about expelling the Turk from Europe and giving the Armenians a government, it implies a duty and responsibility and a burden, and perhaps a difficult one, to the accomplishment and performance of which the United States should be a party as well as the other nations. Col. Roosevelt was not speaking for the Allies alone. He was not declaring that it was their duty, and their duty alone, to make these guarantees and to impose the terms of peace upon the defeated nations.

Col. Roosevelt would never advocate the shirking of a duty. He was speaking for the United States as well as for the Allies, and declaring, I respectfully insist, that there was a joint obligation resting upon the victorious nations that they should reap the fruits of war and jointly labor for the restoration of Europe and the preservation of peace. He contemplated that unless succor were given the new nations they would be a prey of reactionary forces if not of imperialistic powers that might show their sinister forms in Europe. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho does he think that Mr. Roosevelt was speaking of the United States alone when he made the statements which I have just read?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator asks me a question.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I think I know what the views of Mr. Roosevelt were with reference to a league of nations. I do not know that he had ever reduced them to complete form, but he had expressed himself in regard to it many times. I do know that he never favored this kind of a League of Nations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about what the ex-President did believe, I desire to read from an article which was originally written for the Outlook. I quote his words. The date is not given here, but I will insert the date:

All the civilized powers which are able and willing to furnish and to use force, when force is required to back up righteousness * * * should join together to create an international tribunal and to provide rules, in accordance with which that tribunal should act. These rules would have to accept the status quo at some given period, for the endeavor to redress all historical wrongs would throw us back into chaos. They would lay down the rule that the territorial integrity of each nation was inviolate; that it was to be guaranteed absolutely its sovereign rights in matters affecting its honor and vital interest * * *. All other matters that could arise between these nations should be settled by the international court * * *. Then, and most important, the nations should severally guarantee to use their entire military force, if necessary, against any nation which defied the decrees of the tribunal or which violated any of the rights which in the rules it was expressly stipulated should be reserved to the several nations, and rights to their territorial integrity and the like.

In addition to the contracting powers a certain number of outside nations should be named as entitled to the benefits of the court. These nations should be chosen from those which are as civilized and well behaved as the great contracting nations, but which, for some reason or other, were unwilling or unable to guarantee to help execute the decrees of the court by force.

No power should be admitted into the first circle, that of the contracting powers, unless it was civilized, well behaved, and able to do its part in enforcing the decrees of the court.

I think from this statement there can be no doubt that ex-President Roosevelt at that time believed firmly in the principles of article 10, without reservations and without amendments. The statement of principle and policy by Col. Roosevelt is much stronger than the statement in article 10. I commend it to all of you who have voted to nullify article 10.

Mr. LODGE. What was the date of that?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall have to get the date. In the copy that I have the date is not given. I find by looking at the RECORD from which I read, of August 28, 1919, in a speech made by Congressman EWIN DAVIS, of Tennessee, that the article was printed in 1915 in the Outlook, and is from the pen of Col. Theodore Roosevelt. It is an unanswerable statement in favor of our joining the other great nations in guaranteeing the territorial integrity of each nation. Col. Roosevelt evidently believed then, as I believe now, that such an agreement would put an end to wars.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Tennessee has just quoted from an article written by President Roosevelt which clearly indicates his belief in the necessity of a League of Nations. I intended to read before concluding from a book entitled "America and the World War," published in 1919, containing a number of articles written by Col. Roosevelt, in which he expressed views which I insist demonstrated that he believed in the efficacy of a League of Nations and that it was essential in order to promote the peace of the world. Before doing this, however, I desire to repeat again the question propounded to the Senator from Idaho, namely, whether Col. Roosevelt, when he referred to the establishment of new nations in Europe, and the question of guaranteeing them and securing indemnification, intended that the entire responsibility should be devolved upon the United States, or whether he contemplated that the allied nations should alone assume the burden, or whether he did not speak for all of the nations who had joined in the war against the Central Empires and their allies, and whether he did not contemplate that there would be formed a league of nations or a union of nations when the war was ended for the purpose of garnering and protecting the fruits of war and preserving the peace of the world?

Returning to the Lafayette Day address, Col. Roosevelt uses this language:

And don't forget that China is now useless as a prop to a league of peace simply because she lacks effective military strength for her own defense. * * * Let us support any reasonable plan, whether in the form of a League of Nations or in any other shape, which bids fair to lessen the probable number of future wars and to limit their scope.

* * * * * * *

In sum, then, I shall be delighted to support the movement for a League to Enforce Peace or for a League of Nations, if it is developed as a supplement to and not a substitute for the preparation of our own strength, and the cultivation of the intense Americanism which will make us able to use that strength for ourselves and for the well-behaved peoples of the world.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the quotations from the writings of the ex-President, with which the Senator has favored the Senate, support the argument that any proposition can be supported or refuted by quotations from Holy Writ, from the works of Thomas Jefferson, or those of Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not know that I am called upon to either assent to or dissent from the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Colorado. But I was not quoting the words to which I have just referred for the purpose only of supporting the proposition that Mr. Roosevelt favored a League of Nations. I also referred to them for the purpose of emphasizing the point that he did not believe that when the war was over the responsibilities of the United States in Europe were ended, or that the United States should leave the allied nations to assume all of the obligations entailed by the war.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], if I apprehended his position, as stated a moment ago, contended that Mr. Hoover had suggested at one time in a memorandum to the President that we should leave Europe unless certain conditions should arise, and certain arrangements should be entered into, and that because of his attitude we should follow that policy now and leave Europe. At any rate, that is the inference from the Senator's words.

Obviously the Senator read that as an argument in support of the position which he has repeatedly taken here, that it was our duty to get out of Europe, no matter what the consequences were. If there should be a recrudescence of militarism in Germany, or in Bulgaria, or in Turkey, the position of the Senator from Idaho has been, and now is, if I interpret him correctly, that we should leave Europe; that we should let Europe settle whatever controversies may arise; that our duty was ended, if not when the armistice was written, certainly when the peace treaty of Versailles was signed.

Speaking for myself, Mr. President, I am sincerely desirous to see the treaty ratified. I do not, of course, want my country to assume burdens and responsibilities which do not and should not rightfully and properly rest upon her. I wish that we could have escaped the great conflict through which we have passed; but we are in the world, and can not escape the currents that bear nations and peoples upon their bosoms. We were drawn into this conflict, though we were not a trespasser and had no imperialistic ambitions, no lust for territory. The world is so linked together that an offense of one nation is visited, directly or indirectly, upon all nations. But, Mr. President, we have a duty to our allies and to ourselves and to the world. We can not abandon Europe. I believe it to be our duty and the duty of the civilized nations of the world to adopt some rational plan that will make for world peace and for the establishment of justice. The war must not end and leave the world without a chart or a compass. In serving our country and its national aspirations we are serving the world. And the motto of our country is not "Against the world" but "For the good of the world." We can not, like Tennyson's "Lotus Eaters," cry out to the world, "Let us alone. What pleasure have we to war with evil."

Mr. President, the time has come to bring about the cooperation of the free nations of the world to "uphold the sanctity of international rights against nations showing a contempt of humanity." In the Great War through which we have passed we did not fight, as I have stated, for territory or indemnity, but to vindicate our national rights and the honor of our country and to maintain unsullied the flag of this great Republic, and also "for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free."

But let me read further from what Mr. Roosevelt said concerning a league of nations or a league to enforce peace.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator goes on, I should like to supplement what was offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] with a quotation from ex-President Roosevelt upon this subject. Away back in 1910, in his speech accepting the Nobel prize at Christiania, Norway, he said:

It would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace would form a league of peace, not only to keep the peace among themselves, but to prevent, by force if necessary, its being broken by others. The supreme difficulty in connection with developing the peace work of The Hague arises from the lack of any executive power, of any police power, to enforce the decrees of the courts.

And in a communication to the New York Times under date of October 18, 1914, he said:

The one permanent move for obtaining peace, which has yet been suggested, with any reasonable chance of attaining its object, is by an agreement among the great powers, in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decisions of a common tribunal but to back with force the decision of that common tribunal. The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness. * * *

They should, furthermore, agree not only to abide, each of them, by the decision of the court, but all of them to unite with their military forces to enforce the decree of the court as against any recalcitrant member. Under these circumstances it would be possible to agree on a limitation of armaments that would be real and effective.

Mr. President, I intended to refer in a few moments to this address of Col. Roosevelt.

I will, however, at this point place in the RECORD the portion of the address quoted by Mr. Roosevelt in his volume entitled "Fear God and Take Your Own Part," which was written not long prior to his death. It is as follows:

Something should be done as soon as possible to check the growth of armaments, especially naval armaments, by international agreement. No one power could or should act by itself, for it is eminently undesirable from the standpoint of the peace of righteousness that a power which really does believe in peace should place itself at the mercy of some rival which may at bottom have no such belief and no intention of acting on it.

Finally, it would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace would form a league of peace not only to keep the peace among themselves but to prevent by force, if necessary, its being broken by others.

The supreme difficulty in connection with developing the peace work of The Hague arises from the lack of any executive power, of any police power, to enforce the decrees of the court. Each nation must keep well prepared to defend itself until the establishment of some form of international police power competent and willing to prevent violence as between nations. As things are now, such power to command peace throughout the world could only be assured by some combination between those great nations which sincerely desire peace and have no thought themselves of committing aggressions. * * * The combination might at first be only to secure peace within certain definite limits and certain definite conditions, but the ruler or statesman who should bring about such a combination would have earned his place in history for all time and his title to the gratitude of all mankind.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, there is another great American who spoke upon this subject, and I would like to present his views in the same connection.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will wait until I get through with ex-President Roosevelt, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. If my Democratic friends are hunting for Republican precedents, I would also cite Mr. Taft.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought the Senator wanted all that was germane to the subject he is discussing.

Mr. KING. No; and if I had all that was germane to this subject, relevant to it, we would be discussing this question here for an indefinite time. But the conscience of the American people has spoken upon this subject, and they are in favor of a League of Nations; they are in favor of peace; they are in favor of doing their part in Europe and in the world for the perpetuity of peace and the establishment and maintenance of liberty.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is stating what he has heard. He has not heard from all the people.

Mr. KING. I am not going to yield for the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator says the great duty of this country is to remain in Europe and adjust all those matters. Recently in the controversy over the Adriatic boundaries, between Italy and Serbia, involving a very small strip of territory, Italy insisted, as she had a right to insist, upon the performance of her treaties with Great Britain and France giving her this territory. The President objected, and said, in substance, "If my views on the controversy are not carried out, I will withdraw the German treaty."

Does the Senator think we had a very great duty there if the President contemplated withdrawing the treaty on account of that controversy, in which we had no material interest, and the matter involved was comparatively of small importance? Does the Senator think we have any great duty there? It is true, I think, Italy was entitled to the territory, but that is not the question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can not speak for the President of the United States, the great leader, I was going to say, not only of the United States but of the world, the man who has done more for the promotion of international peace and good will than any man in his generation. Whatever may be the fate of this treaty, the name of Woodrow Wilson is secure. He was speaking in Europe, as he has spoken since he came home, for the inarticulate masses of the world. He has spoken for the submerged peoples of the world. His voice has been strong and true for democracy; not only democracy at home, but for democracy throughout the world.

While I have not always agreed with President Wilson, I pay him a tribute for his splendid devotion to democracy and to the cause of liberty here and throughout the world.

Mr. President, I should be glad to discuss the questions suggested by my friend from Tennessee, but they are not germane to the matter which I am presenting. Moreover, I rose to occupy but a few minutes in calling attention to some statements made by Col. Roosevelt and by Mr. Root.

Mr. MOSES and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator a moment ago spoke of having——

Mr. KING. If the Senator desires to ask a question, I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. MOSES. I will ask it very quickly, but I must get the background, because the Senator digressed far from the statement he was making when I first interrupted him. The Senator spoke of having had a demonstration of the conscience of America on this subject and of their opinion. I would like to ask him from what ouija board he received that message?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the only men who consult the ouija board are the irreconcilables, and the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire consults it daily.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no; he reads it in the stars.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from New Hampshire would consult his own conscience and would consult the conscience and voice of the American people, he would not be pursuing the erratic course which has so constantly characterized him since he has been a Member of this body. I yield now to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just said that the President stood for the submerged people of the world. I believe he did. Has not the Senator just voted against the reservation which might have enabled the Egyptians to get out of the condition of submergence?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is a great lawyer. He calls attention to this section of the treaty:

> Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914, and that she renounces the régime of the capitulations in Egypt.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah never voted as the Senator from Missouri indicates.

Mr. REED. If I was wrong, I beg pardon. I thought the Senator voted against the Egyptian reservation.

Mr. KING. I voted against what the Senator denominates the Egyptian reservation. The treaty presents a matter which relates solely to Germany and Great Britain. We were not concerned in it and are not called upon to determine whether there is a protectorate over Egypt or not. The article referred to merely refers to the situation existing in Egypt now affecting Germany and Great Britain alone. As the Senator knows, there were certain capitulatory agreements existing between Germany and the Sultan of Egypt. When, on the 18th day of December, 1914, a protectorate was proclaimed by Great Britain over Egypt, Great Britain set aside, if I may be permitted the expression, those capitulatories, those agreements. She took charge of certain property, personal in character, which was owned by German nationals. England wanted, of course, a validation of her acts as a protecting power in Egypt, and wanted the validation to come from Germany, just the same as we desire Germany to validate the actions of the Alien Property Custodian in the United States.

This provision of the treaty is merely a recognition by Germany of the acts of Great Britain with respect to property in which Germany and German nationals were interested. It is not a recognition——

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me complete my sentence; then I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. For a question only this time.

Mr. KING. Let me complete my sentence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah declines to yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we were not called upon to vote, as I construe it, for the purpose of determining the status of Egypt, or the relations of Great Britain and Egypt.

If we had voted for the reservation which the Senator asked us to vote for we ourselves would have been recognizing the existence of a protectorate. If Germany desired to recognize a protectorate in Great Britain for the purpose of adjusting the property rights between the two nations, she had the right to do so. I voted against this Government recognizing a protectorate, and the Senator from Missouri, in voting for the reservation, recognized the existence of a protectorate. My position, I submit, was a logical one. I neither concede nor deny that a protectorate exists in Egypt. I express no opinion in regard to the question of whether there is or is not a protectorate. I do not know whether there was a protectorate or not. If I had voted for the reservation, which was championed so eloquently by the Senator from Missouri, I would have been committing myself to the proposition that there was a valid protectorate and a protectorate acknowledged by the law of nations. I declined to do it. The Senator took the other view.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for a question.

Mr. MOSES. I wish merely to ask the Senator from Utah, in view of what he said about the relations of Great Britain and Egypt, if he meant for us to understand that the British Government in Egypt was a sort of an international A. Mitchell Palmer?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we are so used to the attempts at humor by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire that it would be very improper for me to disturb the hilarity that exists in this Chamber and in the galleries from his constant efforts.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I just want to make this explanation before I get to my question. The Senator has stated, in substance, that he objected to voting for the reservation because he did not propose to acknowledge a protectorate in Egypt by Great Britain.

I want to ask the Senator two questions: First, does he not know that distinguished British statesmen have asserted to the British people and on the floor of the House of Commons that England has acquired a protectorate?

Mr. KING. I know it, and I have it right here before me. That is not news to me.

Mr. REED. How does the Senator say that the reservation, which I want to read, makes us acknowledge the protectorate?

Mr. KING. I am familiar with it.

Mr. REED. It reads:

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to be merely a war measure to preserve the integrity and independence of Egypt during the war.

How does the Senator claim that that is a recognition of a protectorate?

Mr. KING. Why, the words themselves just read by my distinguished friend confess a recognition of that.

The United States understands the protectorate—

The protectorate!

Mr. REED. Mentioned in the article.

Mr. KING. Not an alleged protectorate, but the protectorate.

Mr. REED. The protectorate mentioned in the treaty. Come right back to the treaty you are voting for.

Mr. KING. "The protectorate" mentioned in the treaty, the adjective "the" and the word "protectorate" there tying them to the words of the treaty. Without attempting to explain the limitations that exist in the treaty or explaining the reasons which may have prompted Germany and England to enter into that particular article of the treaty, I emphasize the point which I make, and I repeat that the reservation voted for by the Senator from Missouri was a recognition of the existence of a protectorate, and by my vote I expressed no opinion as to whether or not there was one.

But I shall not be diverted further from what I started out very briefly to call to the attention of the Senate. If Senators upon the other side are so anxious to call our attention to statements from Democrats and men like Mr. Hoover, who ought to be a Democrat if he is not—he is great enough to be a Democrat and great enough to be President, let me say by way of parentheses—then I am sure the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will be glad to have me call attention to the man whom he apotheosizes so much.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I am glad to have the Senator read them, although I am entirely familiar with them.

Mr. KING. The Senator seems to have forgotten his teacher. As the Senator runs wild for a few days, like some mavericks in the West from whence we come, he forgets the teacher who has guided his destinies in the past, and I want to get him back to safe and solid ground.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have teachers, but I have no master. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think that the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The Chair desires to announce again that if the occupants of the galleries can not preserve order, the galleries will necessarily be cleared. The Chair will not give this admonition another time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not pause to reply to the last statement made by my friend. He is entitled to all the comfort he may get out of that expression.

Mr. REED. May I call the Senator's attention, before he passes the matter——

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I want to call his attention back to the exact language of the treaty which he is voting for, so that he may get right upon the question whether we are recognizing a protectorate by merely referring to it. This article——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KING. I have read textually into the RECORD article 147 except the words "this renunciation shall take effect as of August 4, 1914."

Mr. REED. Will the Senator not let me read it?

Mr. KING. Yes; if the Senator wants to read it again, I have no objection.

Mr. REED (reading):

Germany declares that she recognizes the protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914, and that she renounces the régime of the Capitulations in Egypt.

There is the statement about the protectorate. When the Senator votes for the treaty he votes for that proposition. The reservation which the Senator says sets up a protectorate or acknowledges one, merely refers to the language of the treaty itself. Let me read that reservation.

The United States understands the protectorate referred to in section 6 of the treaty to be merely a war measure.

Does the Senator really say we are recognizing the protectorate by that reservation and not recognizing it by signing the treaty?

Mr. KING. I have repeated in my infirm and feeble way upon a number of occasions that the reservation just read by the Senator is a recognition of the fact that there was a protectorate and that Germany recognized the protectorate. I want to say further, and that will end the discussion upon this point, so far as I am concerned, that if the construction for which I am contending were not the correct one, I should not have voted for the reservation. I am here trying to ratify, as far as I can, the treaty submitted by the President of the United States to the Senate. I do not want to lug, if I may be permitted the vernacular of the streets, into this treaty extraneous, immaterial, and irrelevant matter for the purpose of preventing its ratification. I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, to intermeddle in the affairs of our allies, and I do not want them to intermeddle in our domestic affairs. If time permitted, I should be glad to further discuss this matter, and express my views upon the questions involved in the reservation and amendments which were tabled.

But I shall oppose propositions, no matter how meritorious they might be, as independent matters, which may be offered as reservations to the treaty now under discussion. Let us ratify the treaty and then we can consider the questions that come under the scope of our authority or right.

Just a few more words from Mr. Roosevelt. They will be found here in one of the striking articles, one of them called "Utopia or hell." In speaking of Utopia he is referring to a condition that will be brought about by world peace, and when he refers to hell, obviously he is referring to the condition which shall exist if we continue in the old situation.

Mr. LODGE. What are the dates of those articles?

Mr. KING. The Senator will find them in "America and the World War," by Theodore Roosevelt, published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 1919.

Mr. LODGE. No; I want the dates of the articles, not of the book.

Mr. KING. I am reading from the book.

Mr. LODGE. That is a collection of articles which had previously appeared. I want the date of the article.

Mr. KING. I do not know the date of the article. I am reading from the book.

Mr. LODGE. I did not suppose the Senator did.

Mr. KING. I do not know what the Senator means. I stated, when I called attention to this book, that I was reading from a book put out by Mr. Roosevelt entitled "America and the World War," and I called attention to the articles; I called attention to the closing one, "Summing up," and I called attention to the chapter "Utopia or hell." If that is not sufficiently explicit for the Senator, he may pursue such course as he sees fit.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I think I probably shall do so.

Mr. KING. I see now, if it will gratify the Senator, in looking at the preface, "Theodore Roosevelt, Sagamore Hill, January 1, 1915."

Mr. LODGE. I thought so.

Mr. KING. I am glad the Senator's thoughts are corroborated by the facts.

I read now from the book:

Sherman's celebrated declaration about war has certainly been borne out by what has happened in Europe, and above all in Belgium, during the last four months. That war is hell I will concede as heartily as any ultrapacifist. But the only alternative to war, that is to hell, is the adoption of some plan substantially like that which I herein advocate and which has itself been called Utopian. It is possible that it is Utopian for the time being; that is, that nations are not ready as yet to accept it. But it is also possible that after this war has come to an end the European contestants will be sufficiently sobered to be willing to consider some such proposal, and that the United States will abandon the folly of the pacifists and be willing to cooperate in some practical effort for the only kind of peace worth having, the peace of justice and righteousness.

The proposal is not in the least Utopian, if by Utopian we understand something that is theoretically desirable but impossible. What I propose is a working and realizable Utopia. My proposal is that the efficient civilized nations—those that are efficient in war as well as in peace—shall join in a world league for the peace of righteousness. This means that they shall by solemn covenant—

I fancy that the word "covenant" found in this great article by Mr. Roosevelt will not be very pleasant to the battalion of death who have animadverted so constantly against the covenant of the League of Nations which is now before the Senate for consideration.

This means that they shall by solemn covenant agree as to their respective rights which shall not be questioned; that they shall agree that all other questions arising between them shall be submitted to a court of arbitration; and that they shall also agree—to act with the combined military strength of all of them against any recalcitrant nation, against any nation which transgresses at the expense of any other nation the rights which it is agreed shall not be questioned, or which on arbitrable matters refuses to submit to the decree of the arbitral court.

And here comes the vital and essential point of the whole system—

* * * * * * *

Finally, and most important, this treaty shall put force back of righteousness, shall provide a method of securing by the exercise of force the observance of solemn international obligations. This is to be accomplished by all the powers covenanting to put their whole strength back of the fulfillment of the treaty obligations, including the decrees of the court established under and in accordance with the treaty.

As the battalion of death interpreted the attitude of Mr. Wilson and construed the treaty, there is a covenant upon the part of the members of the league to put their military strength back of the agreement and back of the decrees of the council and of the courts that may be created under the league.

Mr. President, I have a number of other paragraphs of like import from this work which I ask to insert as part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

I earnestly hope that we shall ourselves become one of the joint guarantors of world peace under such a plan as that I in this book outline, and that we shall hold ourselves ready and willing to act as a member of the international comitatus to enforce the peace of righteousness as against any offender big or small.

* * * * * * *

This would mean a great practical stride toward relief from the burden of excessive military preparation. It would mean that a long step had been taken toward at least minimizing and restricting the area and extent of possible warfare. It would mean that all liberty-loving and enlightened peoples, great and small, would be free from the haunting nightmare of terror which now besets them when they think of the possible conquest of their land.

* * * * * * *

International peace will only come when the nations of the world form some kind of league which provides for an international tribunal to decide on international matters, which decrees that treaties and international agreements are never to be entered into recklessly and foolishly, and when once entered into are to be observed with entire good faith, and which puts the collective force of civilization behind such treaties and agreements and court decisions, and against any wrongdoing or recalcitrant nation.

* * * * * * *

After the war has come to an end the European contestants will be sufficiently sobered to be willing to consider some such proposal, and that the United States will abandon the folly of the pacifists and be willing to cooperate in some practical effort for the only kind of peace worth having—the peace of justice and righteousness.

* * * * * * *

My proposal is that the efficient civilized nations, those that are efficient in war as well as in peace, shall join in a world league for the peace of righteousness. This means that they shall by solemn covenant agree as to their respective rights, which shall not be questioned; that they shall agree that all other questions arising between them shall be submitted to a court of arbitration; and that they shall also agree—and here comes the vital and essential point of the whole system—to act with the combined military strength of all of them against any recalcitrant nation, against any nation which transgresses at the expense of any other nation the rights which it is agreed shall not be questioned, or which on arbitrable matters refuses to submit to the decree of the arbitral court

* * * * * * *

It is because I believe our attitude should be one of sincere good will toward all nations that I so strongly feel that we should endeavor to work for a league of peace among all nations rather than trust to alliances with any particular group. * * * The prime necessity is that all the great nations should agree in good faith to use their combined warlike strength to coerce any nation, whichever one it may be, that declines to abide the decision of some competent international tribunal. Our business is to create the beginnings of international order out of the world of nations as these nations actually exist. We do not have to deal with a world of pacifists, and therefore we must proceed on the assumption that treaties will never acquire sanctity until nations are ready to seal them with their blood.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have read also from another distinguished Republican statesman, Mr. Root, commending the many admirable features of this covenant, and insisting, as I interpret his language, that it would be a great mistake not to ratify the treaty. I understand the Senator says that Mr. Bryan is coming, and that he is giving advice. I wonder how often the distinguished chairman of the Republican Party, Mr. Hays, has been in Washington and had conferences with Senators with respect to the League of Nations and how often he has essayed to give advice with respect to their conduct on this important matter? I wonder how many other great Republican leaders—not in the Senate, and there can be Republican leaders outside of the Senate, let me say—have been here in Washington for the purpose of conferring with our friends upon the other side of the aisle with reference to their treatment of this very important question.

No more auspicious occasion has ever come to the world to organize the free peoples of the earth in the interest of justice and of peace. Europe is prostrate and the world is in ferment. The tides of revolution are sweeping nations to destruction.

Stricken people are piteously appealing for help and for the protecting hand of this Nation and of a League of Nations, in order that their independence and freedom may be assured and the opportunity for peaceable growth and development assured.

We have aided the allied nations to destroy autocratic power. We have promised people that they should have liberty. New forces arose in the world when our Nation through President Wilson proclaimed the principles of justice and righteousness which fired the hearts of downtrodden people in all lands. The crown of moral leadership was placed by the nations of the earth upon the head of this Republic. We must not, we can not disappoint the hopes of the world. We can not thrust back into maelstrom and into the turbulent sea the victims of centuries of oppression, and look with cynical indifference upon their struggles and their agonized faces as they sing despairingly beneath the waves. Our Nation is as a city set upon a hill—it illumines the world. It must perform its part in solving the problems which the war has placed before the world. There is so much of merit and worth in the covenant of the league that it should not be destroyed. I appeal to Senators to put aside partisanship, all considerations of personal or party advantage, and remembering only the solemn responsibility resting upon them, to vote upon this question so vital to the peace of the world as their conscience and their duty to country demand.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I offer the reservation which I send to the desk, and I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reservation was read, as follows:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when self-government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the reservation submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is what has just been read at the desk offered as a reservation?

Mr. GERRY. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BORAH. Where is it to appear in the covenant? Of what is it a reservation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair's understanding is that it would be reservation No. 15, if adopted.

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island, it seems to me it ought to be attached to article 11 of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had hoped that I should not be obliged to consume any further time in regard to the treaty, but I can not permit the statements which have been made here in regard to the opinions of Col. Roosevelt to go without a word of correction. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] read from a speech delivered by Col. Roosevelt in 1915, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], on inquiry, was found to be reading from a book which was published in 1915 containing articles and speeches prior to that period.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator pardon me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. KING. I read from an address delivered by Mr. Roosevelt on September 6, 1918.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to say a single word as to former President Roosevelt's opinions just prior to his death. I know that he made a speech in 1914 in favor of a league of nations, or some kind of association of nations—I myself did likewise—and also in 1915. In January, 1917, the President of the United States brought forward a plan for a league to enforce peace in an address to the Senate, and I discussed it at some length, showing the dangers of the proposition and the perils it would bring not only to peace but to the United States.

During all this time I was in frequent consultation with Theodore Roosevelt in regard to it. His position and mine did not then differ at all. On December 21, 1918, I made a speech in the Senate in which I discussed the 14 points and some of the momentous questions which were raised by the proposition for a league of nations which was then being started, or supposed to be started, in Paris. Col. Roosevelt wrote an article upon that speech, which was published in the Kansas City Star, approving it and commending it. I am going to read a single paragraph from that article. After commending the speech which I had made, he said:

Our need is not as great as that of the vast scattered British Empire, for our domains are pretty much in a ring fence. We ought not to undertake the task of policing Europe, Asia, and Northern Africa; neither ought we to permit any interference with the Monroe doctrine, or any attempt by Europe or Asia to police America. Mexico is our Balkan Peninsula. Some day we will have to deal with it. All the coasts and islands which in any way approach the Panama Canal must be dealt with by this Nation, and by this Nation in accordance with the Monroe doctrine.

On January 3, 1919, the Friday before his death, he dictated another editorial, which appeared in the Kansas City Star after his death. I wish time would permit me to read it all, but I will read one paragraph:

* * * Let each nation reserve to itself and for its own decision, and let it clearly set forth, questions which are nonjusticiable. * * * Finally, make it perfectly clear that we do not intend to take a position of an international Meddlesome Mattie. The American people do not wish to go into an overseas war unless for a very great cause and where the issue is absolutely plain. Therefore, we do not wish to undertake the responsibility of sending our gallant young men to die in obscure fights in the Balkans or in central Europe, or in a war we do not approve of. Moreover, the American people do not intend to give up the Monroe doctrine. Let civilized Europe and Asia introduce some kind of police system in the weak and disorderly countries at their thresholds. But let the United States treat Mexico as our Balkan Peninsula and refuse to allow European or Asiatic powers to interfere on this continent in any way that implies permanent or semipermanent possession. Every one of our allies will with delight grant this request if President Wilson chooses to make it, and it will be a great misfortune if it is not made.

That is an absolute condemnation of article 10 as originally drawn and of the paragraphs dealing with the Monroe doctrine.

Less than two weeks before his death I was with Theodore Roosevelt for several hours, seeing him two mornings in succession. The draft of the league, of course, which has been before the country was not then before us, but we discussed fully, in all its bearings, the League of Nations, and the plans for it as we understood them and as they had appeared in the news from Paris. We were in entire agreement. The position that I have taken throughout and that I now take had his full approval. The line I have followed in the Senate and elsewhere was the one which he wished to have followed. I do not say this to transfer one ounce of the responsibility from my shoulders to his. All I do and all I say is on my own responsibility alone, but it has been a great help and strength to me to feel, as I have felt, from those last conversations I had with him, that I have behind me the approval and the support of the great American, the great patriot, the great man whose death has been such a grievous loss to the people of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. REED. May the reservation just offered be read so that we may all hear it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not on the reservation presented by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Chair will say to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Then, let the question be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the reservation offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which the Secretary will state.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the United States, in ratifying the covenant of the League of Nations, does not intend to be understood as modifying in any degree the obligations entered into by the United States and the Entente Allies in the agreement of November 5, 1918, upon which as a basis the German Empire laid down its arms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the reservation as stated.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Announcing once more my pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] and his absence from the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I withhold my vote. The Senator from Wyoming is absent on official business.

Mr. KIRBY (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is paired on this question with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I must withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. GLASS. Then, having a general pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and inasmuch as he has not voted I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 55, as follows:

So Mr. OWEN's reservation was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer the reservation which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reservation will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The following is offered as a reservation:

It shall be the declared policy of this Government that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern and will consider what, if any, action it will take in the premises.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, adding, after the word "premises," the following:

Reserving the independent and uncontrolled power to throw its influence and its weight, whenever occasion arises, in favor of what it deems to be right in the affairs of the world.

That language is taken verbatim from the speech of Mr. Root in New York a few weeks ago, wherein he defined what he conceived to be the correct attitude of this Nation in world affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the reservation proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin it is proposed to add the following words:

Reserving the independent and uncontrolled power to throw its influence and its weight, whenever occasion arises, in favor of what it deems to be right in the affairs of the world.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I will accept the amendment. I have no objection at all to the amendment, and it is strictly in accord with the reservation itself.

This reservation—and I shall only take a few moments—is offered for two reasons: One, it has been constantly asserted here that in the reservations that we have adopted the United States proposed to isolate itself and withdraw from any consideration of the affairs affecting the peace of the world. Of course, there has been no such thought as that upon the part of anyone who has supported these reservations; and, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said last November in proposing a very similar reservation, this is the policy of the United States, whether declared or not; but it does leave the utmost freedom of action upon the part of the United States with reference to any matter that may be taken up for consideration. It does not bind the United States to do anything other than to consider matters affecting the peace of Europe if the peace of Europe shall again be threatened.

In addition, Mr. President, the so-called Taft reservation has been offered here in the Senate and has been rejected, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] gave to the Senate his construction of it. With the Senator's construction of the Taft reservation, it is in exact accord with the reservation which has now been adopted to article 10, together with this reservation of declaration of policy.

On February 16 last the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in construing the Taft reservation referred to, said:

As I myself, in the bipartisan conference, proposed the Taft reservation as a substitute for the Lodge reservation, I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I do not concede the two reservations to be identical in substance; and I should like, for the information of the Senate, to state my own view about it. It is that under the Lodge reservation, when a question arises that would otherwise fall under article 10, Congress may or may not take the matter up for consideration; it does not bind itself to do so. Under the Taft reservation Congress does not obligate itself to assume any obligation at all, but it does obligate itself to take the matter up and decide and determine it. That is my view about the distinction between the two reservations.

So that with the view of the Senator from Montana he would approve, I take it, the reservation that has now been adopted to article 10 with this reservation that is now pending that obligates the United States to take up and consider any attempt to threaten the peace of Europe; but the United States under this reservation is not obligated to take any action. It is obligated to take cognizance of such a situation, but that is all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. If the United States accepts the treaty—that is, if we ratify the treaty with the present reservations—does not the Senator think that under article 10, which contains the undertaking to respect the territorial integrity and the political independence, and under article 11, which permits inquiry into the causes of war, and article 15 and article 16, there is an obligation resting upon the Government after action by the council, at least, to interfere for the protection of the members of the league against any covenant-breaking member of the league?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. KING. Then, if that is true, it would seem to me that the reservation just offered by the Senator is a work of supererogation; that in the league itself, construed as the Senator from Wisconsin construes it, there are binding obligations which are far greater than the mere negative expression contained in the reservation just offered.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to reply to the Senator and give him my view of that. Of course, this general declaration of policy does not relieve the United States of any obligation that it assumes under the treaty, together with the reservations. It is a declaration of policy, but under article 10, where we assume no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, nevertheless there is a case of external aggression threatening the peace of Europe. We are under no obligation, we have entered into no covenant, to take any action whatever with respect to that matter, because of the reservation that we have adopted; but with this reservation we do obligate ourselves not to do anything or decide it any particular way. We do obligate ourselves to take cognizance of that situation, and with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, which, of course, would have been true any way, we are free to take such action as, in our judgment, justice and right shall warrant.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me again, I can not accept the construction which the Senator places upon article 16 and the preceding articles, including article 10. Under article 10 there is an undertaking to respect the territorial integrity. If there is a violation of that covenant, then the violator has breached the covenant and the obligations found in article 16 immediately attach.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; the Senator is entirely mistaken. The obligation that is imposed under article 16 does not in the least degree affect a violation of the covenant to respect territorial integrity. The economic boycott comes into being only for a violation of the covenant not to go to war without arbitration or inquiry, and nothing further.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator there. I think that under the second or third paragraphs of article 16 there would be an obligation where the treaty is breached that would call into requisition whatever instrumentalities article 16 provides for the purpose of maintaining peace.

Mr. LENROOT. Language could not be plainer. The Senator has merely forgotten the language. Article 16 reads:

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants—

Not all its covenants—

in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act at war—

And the economic boycott comes into being. They might violate every other article in the league except those three articles, and article 16 would not come into operation at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is the most humorous proposition with which we have been up to this time confronted. Reading it from its beginning, it could not be offensive even to Germany when we started war with them. It seems to have been drawn so that it could not hurt the feelings of anybody whose past record was opposed to a war with Germany. It reads:

It shall be the declared policy of this Government that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern, and will consider what, if any, action it will take in the premises.

I confess myself at a loss to know why it is necessary to state that if any power or combination of powers threatens the peace of the world the United States will regard the situation "with grave concern." I have always imagined that we would, independently of any senatorial assertion, have to regard it with grave concern.

I confess myself unable to imagine why we should word a reservation to the effect that "we will consider what, if any, action we will take in the premises." Of course, whenever we are confronted with a question of "grave concern" we are also confronted with the question of what, if any, action we shall take in the premises.

But as if this thing were not already humorous enough there is added here in lead pencil by somebody, I do not know by whom, the words:

Reserving the independent and uncontrolled power to throw its influence and its weight, whenever occasion arises, in favor of what it deems to be right in the affairs of the world.

Let us examine the word "it" a minute. "It" refers to the Government of the United States, not to the United States or its people. Of course, if it were referring to the United States, it would have been "they."

But it is "it," and it relates back to the word "Government." So the Government reserves the "independent and uncontrolled power." "Uncontrolled!" Who ever made the United States Government uncontrolled? Who in the world ever made a nation or a people uncontrolled? With the whole civilized world before you, what nation is uncontrolled? Not even we ourselves, with our 110,000,000 and our immense wealth, of which we boast every day. "Uncontrolled power!"

Are you not controlled by civilization, by international law, by the comity of nations, and by that degree of ethics and morality that controls nations? Why should somebody with an immense reserve power of humor, equal to that of Sancho Panza or of Don Quixote—conscious in Sancho Panza's case, and unconscious in Don Quixote's—offer this thing to the United States Senate?

Independent and uncontrolled power to throw its influence and its weight whenever occasion arises in favor of what it deems right.

The man who would put this in said "independent and uncontrolled power to throw its influence," meaning the Government's influence. He ought to have said "their influence," meaning the United States, but he did not say it; and "their weight" he ought to has said, but he said "its," referring back to the Government, "whenever occasion arises, in favor of what it deems to be right."

We would be worse than slaves if we did not do that, and there is no necessity to say that except that it adds "in the affairs of the world." And just before it adds "in the affairs of the world," it says "its uncontrolled power." That sounds like the German Kaiser talking. It sounds as if he were saying that he was God's private agent as the head of the chosen race to impregnate the balance of the world with his "kultur." This is the most stupendous piece of humor, Mr. President, that was ever presented in the United States Senate:

It shall be the declared policy of this Government that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern.

How could they help it if they wanted to? We would have to regard it with grave concern, and if we wanted to disregard it, we would have to still regard it, and if we did not regard it "with grave concern" we would have to regard it with some other sort of concern; and if we did not regard it with grave concern, somebody else would so regard it, and we would be dragged in subsequent "grave concern."

And will consider what, if any, action it will take in the premises.

I rather imagine if a thing is a matter of "grave concern" you have to "consider" at some time or other what, if any, action you are going to take in the premises.

This is the most miraculous thing. It is like the Scriptural definition of man, "It is fearfully and wonderfully made."

"Preserving the independent and uncontrolled power,"—not right, but power; not just right, but "uncontrolled" power—as if we were the only nation on the earth, and the only international integer that was uncontrolled. I imagine that all international integers are controlled. In fact, I imagine they are not integers at all; they are fractions, and the other internationals with us compose the balance of the integer.

Reserving the independent and uncontrolled power to throw its influence and its weight whenever occasion arises in favor of what it deems right in the affairs of the world.

Then, Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin went on to explain this thing, and I quote his exact language. He said:

Under this reservation we obligate ourselves not to do anything—

Mark that, will you.

Under this reservation we obligate ourselves not to do anything.

That is about what we obligate ourselves to do, not to do anything under this. And, by the way, if the Senator from Wisconsin, who has taken the yoke of the Senator from Massachusetts and bears it duly upon his neck, now were to express his relationship to the present treaty with Germany and the League of Nations, I imagine he would repeat this language, that in everything he has voted for he has "obligated himself not to do anything."

We have extracted the teeth from the League of Nations if the Lodge reservations pass—and I suppose they will. We have emasculated the treaty. We have deprived it of all virility, and after we have done that we solemnly assert that we will regard any very important matters that may occur abroad "with grave concern," and that when they occur we will consider "what, if any, action" we will take in the premises, reserving "uncontrolled power" to "throw our influence" whithersoever we please, in behalf of whatever we choose to consider right at that time, without any regard to the balance of the world—Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Switzerland, the Scandinavian powers, Holland—we have nothing to do with them. We just say that we will "throw our influence and weight, whenever occasion arises, in favor of whatever we deem to be right."

Suppose you and I went into a neighborhood with Smith and Jones and Thompson and Johnson, and passed a resolution that we would each reserve his independent and uncontrolled power and throw his influence and his weight "whenever occasion arose" in favor of what each deemed to be right, without any regard to Jones or Johnson or Smith or Thompson, who are also living in the same community.

Will you ever learn that the balance of the nations of the world live on this earth and that God created the earth and created them as well as us? Will you never unlearn, if you ever learned, the old fool lesson that we are self-sufficient and that we need not consult anybody else? Will you ever get rid of the notion of Thomas H. Benton that there was a manifest destiny in the United States to rule the whole world? Will you ever learn that that is nothing but Prussian junkerdom? Will you ever learn that whenever a people say that they reserve the "independent and uncontrolled power" to do whatever it pleases, "as the occasion may arise," that the country which asserts that is asserting hegemony, leadership, and predominance, and if not "Deutschland uber alles," at least "Amerika uber alles," and all that simply spells war and murder of young men upon the field of battle, widowhood amongst the women behind them, fatherless children behind them, sweet, heartless women behind them, and that all this means nothing except arrogance, national arrogance?

"Independent and uncontrolled power." Does not Great Britain exist? Does not France exist? Does not Italy exist? Does not Holland exist? Do not the Scandinavian powers exist? Does not Switzerland exist? Do not the countries of South America exist? "Independent and uncontrolled power?" No country on the surface of this earth has or ought to have "independent and uncontrolled power." Any country upon the surface of the earth that pretends to have independent and uncontrolled power goes further than even the Kaiser of Germany ever went when God and he—I beg his pardon—when he and God were partners in running the world, because he was the senior member of the firm.

Can any civilized country, composed of men pretending to be Christians and servants of the Prince of Peace, assert in a resolution passed by the chief deliberative body of their country—and I say deliberative advisedly because for the last seven or eight weeks it has not done anything except deliberate—and the most august body—and I say that advisedly because if it has not been august it has not been anything—go out now as Christians and as members of the civilized world to assert that there is anywhere in the world an "independent uncontrolled" national power? That is what this asserts.

"Reserving the independent and uncontrolled power." Why, I would not be arrogant enough to say that in the face of Mexico even—anarchistic, chaotic, foolish, and murderous as Mexico is. I do not contend that the United States has any uncontrolled power even with regard to Nicaragua. I would not contend that the United States had any uncontrolled power even with regard to Cuba, who has surrendered her foreign relations to us. That is pure unadulterated manifest destiny arrogance.

You have to be a member of the amphictyonic council of the civilized world or you have to stay out of it. If you are going to be a member of the amphictyonic council of the civilized world, and leave the quarrels between nations to arbitration wherever you can and try to keep the peace of the world in accordance with the doctrines of the Prince of Peace, then you can not contend that there is any such thing as "independence and uncontrolled power" to "throw your influence" whichever way you please. You have to consider the other fellow's rights as well as your own, and the moment you consider his rights as well as your own that moment you are not uncontrolled, that moment you are not independent in a world sense. You are interdependent, and all the nations of this world are interdependent under the law of God and under international law, which is the best expression that man has been able to make of the law of God.

Imagine the humor, if the man had any humor, that drew this thing up. If he intended it as a joke, of course, we would have taken it up and laughed at it, but the man really intended it as an expression of sure enough opinion on this earth of God-created men and women who ought to be friends of one another and not enemies, then it is not a joke but pure stupidity. He did not intend it as a joke at all.

We will "regard any situation with grave concern." I imagine we will—and we will "consider what, if any, action 'we will' take in the premises." What is involved in that? Nothing except that we will do as we blamed please whenever we blamed please when the occasion arises to tell us what we blamed please.

Reserving the independent and uncontrolled power to throw our influence and weight—

"Weight" is a great word there. One hundred and ten millions of people, with billions of money, announcing to the world in a treaty of peace that it reserves the right to throw its uncontrolled power and weight, population and finances in favor of what—in favor of what "it deems" to be right, not even in favor of what is right, but what it deems to be right in the affairs of the world.

Do you remember any day in the life of the late Kaiser of Germany when he ever went any further than that? Do you remember any day in his life when he ever even went that far? Do you imagine that you can make out of yourselves the only nation on earth?

Do you imagine that nations do not live like men do in a neghborhood, the only difference being that men live in a neighborhood of other men and nations live in a neighborhood of other nations? Do you imagine that any nation has any right to talk about its "uncontrolled power" in international affairs any more than I would have a right to talk about my uncontrolled power individually in regard to you or the Senator from Texas? My power is not uncontrolled. It is controlled by the law of ethics and by the law of God and by the municipal law individually speaking. I must not harm the Senator from Texas in the assertion of my individual sovereignty and uncontrolled power, and he must not harm me.

No nation has any right to assert a dogma of uncontrolled power, because a nation must be restrained as an individual must be restrained by the sense of the rights of the other fellow, the other nation, the other people, the other civilization, the other religion, the other whatever it may be.

This was so cunningly worded in the beginning that it would look as if it were worded by a man who had never wanted any war with Germany and was opposed to it. It says:

> It shall be the declared policy of this Government that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers—

That might mean France, Italy, and Great Britain—

> The United States will regard such a situation with grave concern and will consider what, if any, action it will take in the premises.

It is pretty much as if I said that if the Senator from Texas came up and slapped me in the face, I would view it "with grave concern" and would consider "what, if any, action" I would take in the premises.

Then there follows the language of the Senator from Wisconsin, assuring us that "under this we obligate ourselves not to do anything."

I want to say a few words outside of this little foolish amendment, which, of course, does not cut much figure. Fellow Senators, it has seemed to me since I was a boy as if the world were composed of a lot of people, a lot of nations, a lot of races, a lot of religions, and a lot of people everywhere who ought to seek to get along with one another. It has seemed to me since I first conceived the idea of the purposes of Jesus Christ that His purpose was to be a Prince of Peace and that the Christian religion consisted chiefly in trying to live a peaceable life with another individually and nationally. It has seemed to me that whether you were Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, or Mormon, you could all agree upon one thing, and that was that the best thought and the highest thought of every man might be well directed to the question of keeping the peace and settling disputes, whether they were individual, industrial, or international, by some fair, arbitral, common board.

It has seemed to me all the time, with all my individual defects of every description, that the highest worship I could pay to God was to try to live in peace with other people. I admit that I have not been able to do it always with the hot, quick, Welsh temper that led me now and then to strike when I ought not to have struck, but it has seemed to me and it seems to me now that the highest reason for which God created man was that he might cooperate with other men in maintaining peace as a means toward progress and civilization.

I do not recognize that any country under the sun or any nation under the sun, even the United States, has any absolute "independent and uncontrolled" sovereignty. That is an old dogma of the Middle Ages. There is no such thing as an independent and uncontrolled sovereignty amongst civilized countries. Every civilized country acknowledges and admits that its so-called sovereignty is limited by the rights and privileges of other nations and peoples, and that the moment it asserts an uncontrolled or uncontrollable power it sinks itself into barbarism and invites the remainder of the world to sink with it into barbarism.

This whole question comes back to this: Will you or will you not voluntarily limit your own sovereignty to the extent necessary to bring about "peace on earth and good will among men"? There are two sides, either one of which may be right, and nobody between them can be right. One side is the side of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who does not want any entangling alliances of any description with anybody and says that the United States is "sufficient to itself" and can live by itself and must live by and for itself and does not ask for any help from anywhere and will not give any help to anybody. That may be right. The other side is the side which I take, which is that no country can live for and by itself; that it must live interdependent and not independent; and that in living in that way it must agree upon a modus vivendi with the remainder of the world whereby they can all live in peace with one another. Now, the men in between us two, that want to devitalize and emasculate and poison the League of Nations so that it shall not amount to anything except words, in my opinion, are clearly wrong.

I think that the worst thing that could happen for the civilized world would be the object lesson of an unsuccessful League of Nations; an attempt to put forward a so-called or alleged League of Nations which should fail—foredoomed to failure in advance—because after it had failed you could not convince the ordinary man that the idea had not failed. He would merely reply, "That is the thing that you have tried and it has failed." If you want a League of Nations, a League of Nations must be organized with some limitation of sovereign power upon the part of each nation entering into it; and if you do not want that sort of a League of Nations then the Senator from Idaho is right, and you do not want any. If you are not willing to surrender any part of your sovereignty in order to secure the peace of the world and the happiness of the men and women on earth, the sons and daughters of God who inhabit the earth, if you are not willing to surrender a part of each nation's sovereignty and "uncontrolled power" with that object in view, then let it alone and do not go into it at all. The Senator from Idaho is right, if that proposition is right. If, however, you are willing, as I am, to surrender a part of our individual liberty in order to secure peace with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and to leave to a court the power to decide our controversies, and if you are willing to carry that forward still a step more and make it international as well as municipal, then I am right and the men who agree with me are right. However, we are right only upon the theory that the League of Nations must have teeth in it, and it must not be emasculated so that it is foredoomed beforehand to failure.

When these States entered into this Union, when the Provinces of Holland entered into their union, when the Cantons of Switzerland entered into their union, they all understood that there must be a surrender of some degree of State, or cantonal, or provincial sovereign power in order that the purposes of the union might be accomplished.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And the nations that have already entered into the League of Nations have done the same thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad the Senator from Texas has reminded me of that. Not only France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan—the great powers—have entered into the League of Nations and have made it a working concern, which I hope they can make operate for the peace of the world without our intervention and without our modifications and without our membership, if we do not choose to go in, but the three Scandinavian countries have gone in; Switzerland has gone in; Brazil has gone in; Argentina has gone in; Chile has gone in; and you people who are talking about the Monroe doctrine are about to sacrifice it, because if a half dozen South American powers enter into the League of Nations, this great operating concern outside of which you choose to remain and which you can not defeat on sea or on land, which you can not fight on sea or on land—it is too powerful for you—if those South American countries enter into it, and we have a quarrel with one of them, it simply appeals to the League of Nations. Then we shall not face them but we shall face the League of Nations, which means the civilized world. So while you are quarreling here and talking about the Monroe doctrine you have surrendered it and given it up. The League of Nations is in operation and it is going to work. It is stronger than any concert of Europe ever was, because it includes Japan and several of the strongest South American countries. You can not help it if you want to; you are powerless in men and money and navy and army to prevent it if you want to. If you think you can fight the world you are mistaken; you can not. They have made up their minds that they will keep the peace of the world against any lawless outcast nation; and if you want to be a lawless outcast nation, be one if you choose, but you can not win along that line.

Any man who thinks that the United States can be an "independent and uncontrolled power" is either a knave or an ass. No country can be an independent, uncontrolled power on the surface of this earth, not even we, the most powerful people in the world. That is not all; we do not want to be, even if we could be. I do not want to be, in the community in which I move, an uncontrolled power; I want you to have your rights; I want the Senator from Texas to have his; I am willing to give—and I am speaking as a citizen of the United States—I want to give to all the people on earth their rights. I do not want to be "uncontrolled" nor "independent," and no nation on the surface of the earth can be uncontrolled or independent. That is an old Middle Age concept.

There was a time when every community was independent, with the lord's castle on the hill and the village below, and they fought the world for their side arms and for their food. That has passed long ago, and the very word "independent" in connection with a nation is a misnomer to-day. Great Britain is not independent; France is not independent; you are not independent; we are all interdependent with one another; and if we are not, then we are uncivilized, and we sink to barbarism to-morrow, or else we declare war upon the world and the world declares war upon us; and in that sort of a war any particular nation must fall.

As the Senator from Texas has said, pretty nearly all the remainder of the world has gone into this league; we "in the forefront files" of the army of time alone stand out, and stand out how? By a certain 13 or 15 "irreconcilables" and "bitter-enders," who read the riot act to the Senator from Massachusetts and told him what he had to do with this treaty, and the Senator from Massachusetts surrendered and put all their requirements in, and then they concocted it all so that they knew that I and about 26 other Senators on this side could not vote for it in the way they had fixed it up. They have thus arranged to beat the treaty and to beat the League of Nations and to keep the greatest civilized country in the world out of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi if it is not also true that none of the great powers of the world, aside, possibly, from Switzerland, have attached any conditions or reservations to the original treaty as presented to them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in response to that question I will say that China attached certain reservations, but the council very properly told China that she could enter without reservations or stay out, whichever she pleased, and China stayed out. Switzerland attached a reservation that was regarded as totally innocuous, because it was merely a reservation to the effect that Switzerland preserved her rights as a neutral power in Europe, and the neutrality of Switzerland had been recognized by all the powers of Europe years ago.

Now, what I am afraid of in connection with the Lodge reservations is that, blinded by our population, our wealth, and our power, the European might let us in regardless of the Lodge reservations. If I thought they would say to us what they said to China—"No; either accept the thing as we have fixed it or let it alone"—then I would not care, but I am afraid they would let us in with the reservations. If they did let us in with the reservations, then, entering a league with other nations every one of which would be equal and sovereign and equally sovereign, they would have exactly the same limitations that we would have, and the League of Nations would be emasculate and invirile, as incapable of perpetuating itself as an emasculated man might be, and the world in a few years would have the object lesson of an unsuccessful League of Nations; and the minute they saw an unsuccessful League of Nations, the average man in America and Great Britain and France and Italy could not make the distinction, and when you said to him, "This thing failed because it was defective," he could not understand that. He would just simply say: "The experiment of a league of nations has failed. It has gone down. It has been unable to do anything. It was invirile. It was emasculate. It accomplished nothing." Then you shall have discouraged every seer and every prophet and every poet that had dreamt about world peace, and you shall have discouraged him for fifty years to come if not for a hundred.

I would infinitely rather that the United States stayed out of the league than to enter it with such reservations and conditions as emasculated the agreement. I have a hope that Great Britain and France and Italy and Holland and the Scandinavian powers and Switzerland and Japan may make it a working proposition for the preservation of peace in Europe; and if they make it a working proposition for the preservation of peace in Europe, we can make the Monroe doctrine here a working proposition in favor of the preservation of peace in the Western Hemisphere. But if we go in with reservations that render the original agreement invirile and emasculate, then the whole thing will fail; and when it fails, we fail; and when we fail, Jesus Christ fails, and with Him his world peace philosophy.

Have you been watching the news from Russia? Have you been watching the news from Germany? Two weeks ago I rose upon this floor and warned of that situation. None of you paid much attention. Nobody outside paid any attention.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield in a moment. Are you watching that situation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi declines to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I said I would yield in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does decline.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have you been watching that situation? I warn you now that unless you can establish an amphictyonic council of the civilized world, constituting a league of nations to keep the peace of the world, within less than 25 years you will be faced by a union between Germany and Russia and Japan, controlling the four hundred millions of China, and the white race will have to fight for its existence. Now, mark that.

Now I will yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts what the program is as to a vote?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the question.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to get a vote on this reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether it is his intention to have the Senate remain here until we vote upon these reservations?

Mr. LODGE. I wanted to get a vote on the reservation that is now pending, and then I shall ask for a recess.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not intend, then, to get the matter into the Senate to-night—have the committee report to the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I thought it was only fair, and I think the Senator will agree with me, that before holding a night session I should give notice of it. I shall give notice, and I give it now, that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to remain in session until all reservations, both in the Committee of the Whole and in the Senate, are disposed of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not possible to proceed to-night without adjourning until the Committee of the Whole can report to the Senate, and have the resolution before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I am afraid a good many Senators on both sides have gone.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] was compelled to go home, and he requested me to present a substitute for the reservation to article 10 and to request that it be printed for use to-morrow in the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope the Senator will insist on staying in session until we can act on these reservations and get the treaty into the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. ASHURST addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska, who has the floor, yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Some of the Senators have had engagements of some standing for to-night, and I think it is hardly fair to insist at this late hour upon our remaining here to-night to dispose of these reservations. I think something is due to other Senators in this matter.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. I appreciate what my friend the Senator from Ohio says, but I will now do the unparliamentary thing of propounding a question to each of my beloved brother Senators: Is there a Senator here who believes a vote will be changed should we talk for a week? I pause for an answer. If any Senator believes a vote will be changed, I will not urge that we proceed; but, Mr. President, while I do not speak for myself, I do speak for some other Senators who have engagements to-night, and have engagements to-morrow night, other Senators who are obliged to be in their States on Saturday, when I say that since it is obvious to us all, as practical men, that not a vote will be changed, why spin and spin and weave nothing? Why go through the tedious performance—and to me the speeches are not tedious; I enjoy them, and they are interesting—why go through the performance of everlastingly talking, talking, talking, when, Senators, we know that not a single vote will be changed. Now, why talk so much?

So, on behalf of other Senators who I know have remained in this Chamber this week and have canceled important engagements in their States, I do say we ought to get this resolution ready by 6 o'clock to-night, so that we can vote to-morrow finally.

Mr. LODGE. The first thing to do, then, is to vote on the pending reservation.

Mr. ASHURST. Well, let us vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to send to the desk and to have read, so that it may be printed for use to-morrow, a reservation that will be offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] as a substitute for the reservation to article 10.

Mr. LODGE. It is not necessary to have it read, is it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. I ask to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

Mr. LENROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment? I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether it is not possible to come to a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate upon the reservations, and to dispose of them to-night by limiting debate?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the only objection I have to a night session is that I do not wish to be unfair to other Senators who have had no notice of it. If we are going to hold a night session, as I propose to do to-morrow night, I think they ought to have notice. I am willing to make any agreement that can be made to vote within any short time. I am not going to put it off if I can help it.

Mr. REED. Let me ask the Senator if he would be willing at this time to ask unanimous consent to waive the rule with reference to the intervening day between the final vote upon reservations and the vote upon the resolution of ratification?

Mr. LODGE. I would be perfectly willing to ask unanimous consent to introduce the resolution now.

Mr. OWEN. That is a good idea.

Mr. LENROOT. It can not be done until the reservations are adopted.

Mr. LODGE. It can not be done, of course, until we get into the Senate. We can not offer it until that time; but, of course, I will ask unanimous consent to waive the rule that requires it to go over to a subsequent day. That is constantly done in considering treaties. Everybody knows what it is. It has been lying on our desks here for a fortnight.

Mr. REED. Could not that be asked now?

Mr. LODGE. I will ask that now—that when the treaty reaches the Senate, and the resolution of ratification is presented, the rule which requires that resolution to go over to the subsequent day may be waived.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think it will be time enough to decide that when we come to it, and I object.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I thought I had it. I do not know when it was taken away from me, but I will sit down.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from Wisconsin has yielded. I was going to suggest, however, that we should not lose the opportunity that seems to be here presented. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has suggested that speeches be shortened, as I remember his remarks, to 15 minutes. If there is a disposition at least to secure that unanimous consent at this time, I think we would be making wonderful headway.

Mr. LODGE. I make that request.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that that applies to all reservations——

Mr. EDGE. Just to reservations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But not to debate after the reservations are perfected.

Mr. LODGE. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Massachusetts state his request?

Mr. LODGE. My request is that no Senator shall speak more than 15 minutes on any reservation now pending or hereafter to be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has a very important reservation. I do not know whether he would want to be limited to 15 minutes on that or not.

Mr. LODGE. I do not, either.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania very rarely speaks over 15 minutes.

Mr. BORAH. It is a very important matter, and I should like to telephone to him, at least.

Mr. LODGE. I think that could be excepted. He is the only Senator of whom I know who has another reservation.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will wait a minute, I will go in and telephone to him.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have two reservations that I want to offer. I do not care to debate them at length, but I want to present them.

Mr. LODGE. I will renew the request as soon as the Senator from Idaho has heard from the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as to the pending reservation, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] offered an amendment, and as he read it I said that I was willing to accept it. My attention has since been called to the fact that at least under a possible construction it would cut out all of the obligations that are assumed under the treaty with these reservations, and I therefore wish to withdraw my acceptance of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, and ask that we have a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that ought not be done in the absence from the Chamber of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. LENROOT. I have consulted the Senator from Idaho, and he knows this course is to be taken.

Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber.

Mr. LENROOT. Here he is. I will state to the Senator from Idaho that I have withdrawn my acceptance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I do not intend to vote for the original, even with my amendment on it, I do not feel in good faith that I can urge it. So I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is upon the reservation proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. REED and Mr. LODGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before relative to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY], and that Senator being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent on official business, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] on business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. UNDERWOOD'S name was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on official business of the Senate. He has a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness, to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I notice that he is absent from the Chamber, and I withhold my vote. If I had the privilege of voting, I would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 39, as follows:

So Mr. LENROOT's reservation was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent that no Senator shall speak more than 15 minutes or more than once on any reservation or any amendment to a reservation now pending or hereafter to be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that no Senator shall speak more than once nor for a longer time that 15 minutes on any reservation or any amendment that may be pending or that may be hereafter offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator would strike out "more than once," so that a Senator could divide his 15 minutes if he wanted to do so.

Mr. LODGE. I mean 15 minutes on each reservation or on any amendment.

Mr. REED. But the Senator says "more than once." Suppose a Senator offers a reservation and some one says something to which he wants to reply within his 15 minutes.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, he has his whole 15 minutes.

Mr. REED. The Senator proposes to say "more than once."

Mr. LODGE. He can divide it himself.

Mr. REED. But the proposition does not permit that, if I heard it aright.

Mr. LODGE. I think it does. It certainly was intended to do so. It is 15 minutes on each reservation that any Senator is to have, or on each amendment, and he can divide it as he pleases.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the Senator to strike out "more than once," and say "not more than 15 minutes in all."

Mr. LODGE. I will leave it for the Assistant Secretary to word, because he can word it better than anybody else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the proposed agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes on any reservation or any amendment now pending or hereafter offered.

Mr. LODGE. Fifteen minutes in all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest that I think we can accomplish the object we have in view if we would strike out the words "more than once," and simply say "no Senator shall speak more than 15 minutes in all on each reservation or on any amendment thereto."

Mr. REED. That is the suggestion I made.

Mr. LODGE. That covers it, and is the best way to word it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement as modified.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that no Senator shall speak more than 15 minutes in all on any reservation, or on any amendment now pending or that may hereafter be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to give notice that to-morrow, if the Senate will sustain me, I shall ask the Senate to remain in continuous session into the evening, if necessary. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 18, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH).

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, Father in Heaven, that the good that men do lives after them and the spirit which moves them to deeds of kindness, self-sacrifice, and glory enters into the hearts of their admirers. Thus good is handed down from generation to generation. And we look forward to the time when good shall banish evil and Thy kingdom indeed come on earth. Hence we join in the encomiums and songs of praises which shall fall from thousands of lips to-day in memory of Ireland's patron saint. Long may his memory live, and long may he inspire men to live Christ-like, God-like lives, and thus may his life be a blessing to millions yet to come. In the name and spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting two short editorials printed in the American Federationist, the official organ of the American Federation of Labor. These editorials are very vigorous attacks upon bolshevism and communism, and they warn the American workingmen of the evil effects of bolshevism and communism in Russia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting two editorials from the American Federationist on the subject of bolshevism. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman how long they are?

Mr. COOPER. I should say they would cover about two pages of the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The reason why I ask is that the other day a Member got leave to print a letter of some one in the RECORD, and he inserted a stump speech of three pages of the RECORD under the guise of inserting a letter. But I shall not object to this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INCOME TAXES ON STOCK DIVIDENDS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury showing the amount of loss in revenue caused by the Supreme Court's recent decision on taxes upon stock dividends, and so forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury relating to the stock-dividend decision of the Supreme Court. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan if as yet his committee has taken any steps to recoup on that loss?

Mr. FORDNEY. There has been a bill introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], and it is now before the committee, but the committee has not yet taken action, waiting for some reliable information as to the loss of revenue because of this court decision. It is not yet given in full, but this letter explains it rather clearly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the committee inclined to try to fill up the hole that the Supreme Court made in the income-tax law?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think so.

Mr. GARNER. Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri that the committee has already discussed the matter, and to-morrow morning, if I understand it correctly, we shall have a hearing of the Treasury expert, the actuary expert, and the legal adviser as to what we might be able to do under the situation, and then we would consider the question of the advisability of it. I think that is correct.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes,

Mr. LAZARO. Has the committee taken into consideration the probable increase from the income tax that we are now collecting? As I understand, there will be a big increase from what we have expected.

Mr. FORDNEY. Reliable estimates have not yet been given to us. This letter explains in great detail the amount of loss that is involved in this decision of the court.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

MARCH, 1920.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FORDNEY: I am very glad to respond to your threefold request, communicated through Dr. Adams, for estimates of the loss in revenue which may be expected to result from the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the stock-dividend case, for recommendations concerning a new method of dealing with personal service corporations, and for definite suggestions looking to the fundamental simplification of the income and profits taxes, brief enough to receive but thoroughgoing enough to deserve careful consideration at a session of the Congress crowded with other questions of grave importance. To facilitate their presentation I may discuss these subjects in the inverse order in which they have been mentioned above.

SIMPLIFICATION OF THE INCOME AND PROFITS TAXES.

In dealing with this subject I may go at once to what is, in many respects, its most vital aspect—the question of early action. Public opinion has not yet awakened to the gravity of the consequences which are likely to follow a failure to simplify the tax law at this legislative session. Unless the necessary amendments be passed now they will be delayed in all probability, I understand, until the autumn or winter of the year 1921, with the result, unless they are to disrupt the administrative procedure and confuse the necessary calculations of the taxpayer by being made retroactive, that income and profits taxes must continue to be collected on the basis of the present law until the close of the calendar year 1922, and in the case of some taxpayers on the so-called fiscal-year basis, until the early months of the calendar year 1923. I can not contemplate such delay without the gravest apprehension. An imperfect and uncertain tax affects the future even more adversely than the present, and for similar reasons it is costly and unwise to make a beneficent modification of the tax law retroactive or even to delay its adoption and announcement until the time at which it is to take effect. It would be manifestly unsafe, in my opinion, to reduce now the income and profits taxes to be collected in the calendar years 1920 and 1921, but I can see nothing in the financial prospects for the calendar year 1922 and thereafter which would make impossible or unwise the very modest reduction involved in the plan of simplification hereinafter presented; and it should never be forgotten that the tax system itself is one of the most powerful causal factors affecting public expenditures. A tax system yielding, or likely to yield in the future, a surplus of revenue over expenditures is an open invitation to public extravagance, whereas an announced resolution to reduce taxes as the occasion which called them forth recedes into the past is one of the most potent means of insuring economy in public expenditures. The people, therefore, consumers as well as producers, indirect as well as direct taxpayers, may fairly ask to be told now the earliest future date at which the most obsolete features of the tax law are to be repealed.

Complexity in tax laws violates the most fundamental canon of taxation—that the liability shall be certain and definite. It is not merely a source of irritation, labor, and expense to the taxpayer, but when conjoined, as it is in the present law, with the heavy rates of taxation which war exigency has forced upon us it becomes a major menace, threatening enterprise with heavy but indefinable future obligations, generating a cloud of old claims and potential back taxes which fill the taxpayer with dread, creating, to be sure, an attractive source of additional revenue, but clogging the administrative machinery and threatening, indeed, its possible breakdown.

1. Final determination and settlement of tax claims and assessments: I recommend, therefore, as the most urgent and important of the measures of simplification which could advantageously be put into effect at once, an amendment authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the consent of the taxpayer and the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury (or under such other public safeguards as the Congress may prefer), to make a final determination and settlement of any tax claim or assessment, which shall not thereafter be reopened by the Government or modified or set aside by any officer, employee, or court of the United States, except upon a showing of fraud, malfeasance, or misrepresentation of fact materially affecting the determination thus made.

This recommendation is of major importance. At present the taxpayer never knows when he is through. Every time an old ruling is changed by court decision, opinion of the Attorney General, or reconsideration by the department, the department feels bound to apply the new ruling to past transactions. The necessity of constantly correcting old returns and settlements is as distressing to the department as it is obnoxious to the taxpayer. But an even more serious situation arises in connection with the assessment of back taxes. The tax return of a large corporation is likely to be crowded with debatable points which the corporation, in the first instance, usually decides in its own favor. The auditing of these returns has been necessarily delayed by the inability of the Bureau of Internal Revenue to engage and hold a sufficient force of experts to audit promptly the more complex and difficult returns; but when the audit comes to be made it ordinarily brings to light a large amount of back taxes. A prompt determination and collection of such back taxes due would probably bring in additional revenue exceeding $1,000,000,000. On the other hand, this situation must fill the taxpayers concerned with the gravest apprehension. If present taxes be continued and a period of industrial depression ensues during which the department finds the time and the men with which to clear up both current and back taxes within the same year, the result may be highly disastrous to business.

The commissioner should be empowered and directed to dispose of these cases promptly and finally. This procedure would bring in much additional revenue, relieve business from grave uncertainty, keep out of the courts many debatable cases, and help to avert an administrative deadlock.

2. Interpretative regulations or Treasury decisions not to be retroactive: As a desirable concomitant of the preceding suggestion and for reasons stated in explaining that suggestion, I recommend the adoption of an amendment providing in substance that in case a regulation or Treasury decision made by the commissioner or the Secretary, or by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, is reversed by the subsequent issue of a similar regulation or decision, and such reversal is not immediately caused by or based upon an opinion of the Attorney General or a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, such new regulation or decision may be made effective from the date of approval.

3. Five-year limitation on time for bringing suit for collection of taxes: Section 250 of the revenue act of 1918 now provides, in subdivision (d), that no suit or proceeding for the collection of any tax shall be begun after the expiration of five years after the date when the return was due or was made, except in the case of false or fraudulent returns with intent to evade the tax. This subdivision has been held to apply only to taxes due under the revenue act of 1918. I recommend that this time limit be extended to all income and profits taxes due either under present or prior acts of Congress.

4. Simplification of Liberty-bond exemption: The exemptions from income surtaxes authorized by the several Liberty-bond acts are highly complex and responsible for perhaps the most intricate schedule of the return which the individual taxpayer is required to fill out. My predecessor in office has recommended a consolidation of these exemptions which while not breaking faith with the holders of Liberty bonds would simplify their tax returns, and operate to strengthen the market standing of such bonds without in any appreciable amount reducing the public revenue. I heartily indorse this recommendation, the detailed provisions of which may be found on pages 99 and 100 of the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1919.

5. Compensation for personal service and gains from sales or dealings in property: The heavy surtaxes cause real hardships when income earned over a period of years is realized or received in one year and taxed as a lump sum in that year. I recommend, therefore, that such extraordinary income, when it constitutes a material part of the gross income for that year, be deemed to have accrued or been received ratably during the years in which the service was rendered or the property held, and the amount of the extraordinary income so assigned to any year be subjected to the surtax rates prescribed by law for that year.

6. Excess-profits tax: Provision for the simplification and fundamental modification or repeal of the excess-profits tax at the earliest possible future date should, in my opinion, be made now. In explaining this conclusion it is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of controversial details. Two facts impress me as indisputable and conclusive: First, the application or calculation of the excess-profits tax is so complex that it has proved impossible to keep up to date the administrative work of audit and assessment. New returns are being made faster than old returns can be audited, resulting in an accumulation of claims and potential back taxes, the dangers of which have already been described. Second, the profits tax is confined to a small fraction (in number) of the business concerns of the country. Personal-service corporations, partnerships, sole proprietors, and most forms of trust organizations are exempt from the tax. If the principle be sound, it should be extended to all forms of business organization, a proposal which administrative considerations alone stamp as impracticable either in the present or any future period near enough to be worth consideration.

The general course or principle which simplification of this part of the tax law should follow is, I believe, reasonably clear. The outstanding feature of the present system of income taxation in its most important application to business income is the fact that we employ for this purpose two systems of taxation which are incommensurate and irreconcilable. Corporations pay the profits tax and normal income tax while their stockholders pay surtaxes on dividends or distributed profits, but nothing in respect of the undistributed corporate profits. On the other hand, sole proprietors and the members of partnerships pay full income tax, normal tax, and surtaxes upon the entire profits of their business whether distributed or not, but are exempt from the profits tax. The profits tax on corporations is evidently meant to be a rough equivalent for the surtaxes levied upon the reinvested or undistributed profits of other forms of business. But no true equivalence is reached. In 1918 the members of a well-known partnership paid nearly $1,125,000 more taxes than they would have paid had their business been organized as a corporation. And the contrary is quite as frequently true.

There should be one system and not two systems of income taxation applicable to persons engaged in business. Substantial uniformity of treatment, or at least a nearer approach to uniformity of treatment, could be achieved in a variety of ways, the details of which it is not necessary to discuss here. I outline below one such plan which has many attractive features, the detailed provisions of which I shall be glad to supply upon request. The technical details while important are elastic and susceptible of modification. The essential thing is to simplify the excess-profits tax and grasp a uniquely opportune moment to remedy a deeply rooted defect in our system of income taxation by providing for the just taxation of the undistributed profits of corporations at a time when such taxation represents simplification and relief, not further complexity and heavier burdens. Equalization of the tax upon corporate and unincorporated business can be accomplished now with benefit to the corporations, the Government, and the general public. We should grasp an opportunity which may never return. The principal features of the plan referred to above are as follows:

(a) This plan is designed, first, to eliminate from the war-profits and excess-profits tax law (except as it is applied to profits derived from the so-called "war contracts"), all reference to or use of "invested capital"; and, second, to place the taxation of incorporated and unincorporated business concerns, so far as may be, on substantially the same basis.

(b) The first object is accomplished by substituting for the present graduated rates of 20 and 40 per cent a flat tax on profits in excess of the distributed earnings. A rate of 20 per cent has been used as the basis of certain estimates quoted below, but the adoption of the proper rate is, of course, a matter which the committee will desire to settle for itself. It would be possible to adopt a declining rate, say, of 25 per cent, for the first year in which the suggested amendment is in operation, 20 per cent for the second year, and 15 per cent thereafter. It is only necessary that the rate should be fixed at one figure for a particular year.

(c) The second object could be accomplished (although the plan would be well worth while without this feature) by making it explicit in the law that corporations have the right to pay dividends in bonds or promises to pay bearing a fair rate of interest which are taxable to the stockholders as ordinary dividends, or by authorizing corporations to receive back from their stockholders as "paid-in surplus," cash, or other dividends recently distributed. Under these or analogous procedures a corporation could retain its profits for use in the business and yet convert the profits tax into a genuine income tax. The excess-profits tax would thus become a flat tax on undistributed earnings; "invested capital" would practically disappear; and the corporation if it desired could place itself on substantially the same basis as the partnership, the personal-service corporation, and the sole proprietor. The principal object of this suggested amendment is to simplify the tax by removing the greatest source of inequality and complexity now found in the tax laws, i. e., the use of "invested capital."

(d) Revenue needs make it impracticable, in my opinion, to apply the preceding amendment to profits for the calendar year 1920, the taxes upon which will be payable in the calendar year 1921. But it should be put into effect as soon thereafter as the diminishing expenditures of the Government will permit. It is estimated that with a 20 per cent rate and on the basis of present corporate net income the suggested amendment would reduce the tax revenue by approximately $430,000,000 a year. If, for instance, the amendment were adopted and made to apply to income received on and after January 1, 1921, the first reduction in the tax collections would occur in the last half of the fiscal year 1922, and would amount to $215,000,000 for that fiscal year.

(e) However, present corporate conditions can hardly be maintained, and if corporate income declines and invested capital increases as rapidly as they have done in the past 12 months the proposed amendment would probably cause no reduction in the future revenue. New schemes are constantly being devised for the purpose of increasing invested capital. It is time to provide for a modification of the excess-profits tax, not only to relieve the taxpayer but because of an approaching decline in its productivity.

8. Reduction of surtaxes on income saved and reinvested: In connection with the suggested tax on the undistributed profits of corporations attention may appropriately be directed to a possible extension of its application which would go far to rectify one of the most dangerous defects of the present income tax. Because of possible doubt about the effects of such a change upon the revenue and because the details of the proposal as they now present themselves to my mind could not accurately be said to simplify the mere computation of the tax I do not urge its adoption at this session of the Congress, but I have no hesitation in expressing my personal opinion that this or some similar amendment embodying the same idea could advantageously be adopted, to take effect at the earliest future date at which, in the opinion of the Congress, revenue needs and prospects permit.

While it is vitally important that saving and reinvestment effected through the medium of the corporation should not be dealt with more leniently than similar savings made by the partnership or individual, it is equally important that the methods of taxation employed should in all cases penalize saving and investment as little as possible. Our present surtaxes offend greatly in this respect. We attempt to levy surtaxes, rising to 65 per cent upon ordinary income, while there are thousands of millions of tax-free securities in the market the income from which is practically exempt from all taxation. The result is to make investment by wealthier taxpayers in the expansion of industry or foreign trade unattractive and unprofitable. It is obvious that this situation should be remedied.

The remedy which most commends itself to my judgment at the present time is to reduce (e. g., by one-fourth) surtaxes attributable to that part of the net income which is saved and reinvested in business or property yielding taxable income and at the same time to limit the total amount of such reduced surtaxes to the same percentage (e. g., 20 per cent) of the reinvested income as the rate imposed upon the undistributed profits of corporations. The maximum tax upon such saved income would thus be approximately the same, whether reinvested by the individual, the partnership, or the corporation, and whether reinvested personally by the stockholders of a corporation or by such corporation for its stockholders. If at any later date the profits of a corporation which had paid the undistributed profits tax came to be distributed, a credit equal to the tax already paid by the corporation could, if it were thought wise, be easily granted to the stockholders.

The revenue lost by such an amendment could, if necessary, be made up by increasing the normal tax or that portion of the surtaxes attributable to income spent for purposes of consumption. But the time is fast approaching when the adoption of such an amendment would cause little real reduction of the revenue. We can not long continue to collect surtaxes rising to 65 per cent upon income from ordinary business and investment while exempt interest at a remunerative rate can easily be secured from tax-free bonds. We must take something less than 65 per cent or in the end take nothing. On the other hand, no reduction is urged in respect of income spent for unnecessary or ostentatious consumption. Income saved and reinvested in property or business yielding a taxable income should be taxed at a lower rate; income spent for consumption or invested in tax-exempt securities should pay at established rates both the normal tax and surtaxes. To the extent that it falls on savings the income tax should be reduced; to the extent that it is a tax on waste it should be maintained or even increased.

PERSONAL-SERVICE CORPORATIONS.

Under the revenue act of 1918 personal-service corporations are treated substantially as partnerships, i. e., the corporation as such is exempt from income, profits, and capital stock taxes, but stockholders are subject to both normal income tax and surtaxes upon their full distributive shares in the net income of the corporation whether such income is actually distributed or not. The validity of this procedure is involved in the gravest doubt by the doctrine enunciated in the stock-dividend case, which apparently leads to the conclusion that a stockholder of a corporation, particularly a minority stockholder, can not be taxed (without apportionment according to population) upon a share of the corporation's income which he has not actually received. It is possible, notwithstanding the above reasoning, that the present statutory method of dealing with personal-service corporations might be sustained on the ground that it represents in general, in its effects upon personal-service corporations and their stockholders as a class, a relief provision imposed in lieu of the excess-profits tax which is unsuited to personal-service corporations, and if applied to them generally would in many cases work intolerable hardships. But this interesting question need not be discussed here. There is a grave possibility, if not probability, that the stock-dividend decision practically exempts from all income and profits taxation a group of approximately 2,500 corporations and their stockholders, who would pay under existing law—and should in fairness pay at least—from five to six million dollars. This possibility, with its consequent uncertainties, should plainly be removed by the passage of amendatory legislation.

Fortunately it is possible to place personal-service corporations and their stockholders in nearly the same position that they now occupy—in a manner wholly consistent with the spirit and letter of the ruling of the Supreme Court—by applying to such corporations on and after January 1, 1918, the tax on undistributed profits recommended above for all corporations on and after January 1, 1921. This tax would, of course, be in lieu of the war-profits and excess-profits tax, which, because of its dependence upon "invested capital," can not intelligently be applied to personal-service corporations in which, by definition, "capital (whether invested or borrowed) is not a material income-producing factor." It is plain also that the law should be so amended as to tax dividends received by the stockholders of personal-service corporations in the same manner as other dividends are taxed.

It would be desirable, moreover, in my opinion, to permit personal-service corporations at their option to distribute during the year 1920 cash or other taxable dividends to the full extent of their profits earned during 1918 and 1919, but not yet distributed; and such retroactive distributions should be made taxable by the stockholders at the surtax rates applicable to the years in which the profits were accumulated by the corporation. By so doing personal-service corporations could, if they desired, place themselves and their stockholders in nearly the same position that they now occupy, i. e., they would pay no profits tax at all, while the entire corporate income (having been distributed) would be taxable in the hands of the stockholders. Indeed, so closely would the proposed plan resemble in effect the method of taxing personal-service corporations prescribed in the revenue act of 1918 that it would be eminently proper—and probably a source of great convenience to the taxpayers concerned—to authorize personal-servcie corporations with the written consent of their stockholders to select voluntarily to pay taxes for the years 1918 and 1919 on the basis prescribed in the revenue act of 1918.

ESTIMATES OF PROBABLE LOSS IN REVENUE RESULTING FROM THE DECISION IN EISNER AGAINST MACOMBER.

The loss resulting from this decision falls into two principal classes, that chargeable to the possible exemption of public-service corporations and their stockholders, and that chargeable to the complete exemption of the stock dividends.

There are about 2,500 personal-service corporations having net income of approximately $30,000,000 involved, the taxes upon which, under existing law, do not exceed $6,000,000 for the year 1918, and a slightly smaller amount for the year 1919. The aggregate loss for the two years, 1918 and 1919, would probably be between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000. The need for legislation in this connection arises not so much from the possible loss of revenue as from the obvious undesirability of permitting 2,500 corporations and their stockholders to escape both the taxes upon corporations and those imposed upon individuals.

The loss resulting from the exemption of stock dividends is very difficult to estimate, owing to the fact that such dividends have not in the past been separately shown on the returns, while the losses from the exemption of stock dividends as such will be partially or wholly offset by the heavier taxes resulting from the decision upon any gains realized from subsequent sale of stock and by other offsetting factors which need not be mentioned in detail. After consideration of these factors the actuary of the Treasury Department estimates that the net loss or refund of taxes already paid—i. e., taxes for the period ending with the year 1918—will be in the neighborhood of $35,000,000, and that taxes for the year 1919 (payable in the calendar year of 1920) will be reduced by approximately $70,000,000 on this account. These figures may be regarded as maxima, and most of the experts of the department are of the opinion that the entire net loss resulting from the exemption of stock dividends will amount to less than $25,000,000.

The suggestions made above do not comprehend all the changes in the present law, which, in my opinion, could be advantageously adopted at the present session of Congress. I have confined my suggestions to an irreducible minimum of measures looking largely to the simplification of the income and profits taxes, for the consideration of which there still remains time and action upon which at this session of Congress may reasonably be asked by the taxpaying public. I shall be glad, upon request, to submit drafts of amendments embodying the suggestions here presented and to place at your disposal for the work of tax revision all of the personnel and facilities of the Treasury Department.

Respectfully, DAVID F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 9023. An act to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 299. Joint resolution extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of two years from March 21, 1920.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 11309) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to fix compensation of certain laborers in the Customs Service, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. WALSH of Montana and Mr. FRANCE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER, LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 316.

Resolved, etc., That in the exercise of its control and direction for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial, authorized by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911, the commission created by said act shall designate to perform the duty of special resident commissioner to represent the commission in the oversight of the work the Hon. John Temple Graves, recently appointed a member of the Lincoln Memorial Commission as the successor of the Hon. Joseph C. S. Blackburn, deceased, and for the special service of the member so designated he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum out of the appropriations for the construction of such memorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it in order for the House on Calendar Wednesday to consider such matters to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the view of the Chair, that this is presented under a request for unanimous consent on Calendar Wednesday before the call of the calendar is proceeded with, it would be in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have no objection to the resolution, but I simply wanted to know the situation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will my colleague inform the House under what authority Mr. Graves was named as a member of the commission? I may be in error about it, but I was under the impression that it took a resolution of Congress to appoint a member of the commission.

Mr. CANNON. He was appointed by the President.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand that.

Mr. CANNON. And confirmed. Senator Cullom was the first resident commissioner.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He was appointed by resolution of Congress and so was Senator Blackburn.

Mr. CANNON. This is a joint resolution now to appoint as resident commissioner Mr. Graves.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have no objection to that, but I wanted to inquire under what authority the President had named a member of that commission.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will yield to me half a minute, I will tell the gentleman. My own impression was, until yesterday afternoon, that the President did not have anything more to do with it than the man in the moon. But I hunted up the original act, and to my utter surprise it provides that the President is authorized to fill vacancies.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That settles that. I have another suggestion which I wish to make to the two distinguished gentlemen who are members of the commission. It was recently announced that it was expected to dedicate the Lincoln Memorial, I think, next fall, when, undoubtedly, these two members of the commission will be here themselves. I think it would be a burning shame if the Lincoln Memorial should be dedicated when Congress is not in session. The project originated with Congress, was carried through and provided for by Congress, and yet it is proposed to dedicate that memorial, before it is finished, before the grounds are arranged, when Congress will be on vacation. I think we are entitled to be here as well as the members of the commission. [Applause.] I hope we will not make any appropriation to have that dedication occur at any time when Congress is not in session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. BUTLER. With the consent of the House, this being Calendar Wednesday, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I report herewith the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk. If I may be permitted further, I would say that we hope to take this bill up for consideration when the Army reorganization bill is passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reports the naval appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill, with the accompanying report, will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

DECLARING LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY A LEGAL HOLIDAY.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 12724, to declare Lincoln's birthday a legal holiday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the bill H. R. 12724, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the 12th day of February in each year, being the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, is hereby made a legal holiday within the District of Columbia, to be known as Lincoln's birthday, and in its observance and effect it shall be subject to all the provisions of law applicable to holidays within said District.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, of course no words can add to or detract from the glory of Abraham Lincoln. It is imperishably fixed not only in the public mind of America but of the whole world. I shall, therefore, not attempt to extoll him, but simply call attention to the fact that 26 States of the Union have made the anniversary of his birth a legal holiday, while it has received no Federal recognition. The purpose of the present bill is to give such recognition. It seems to me highly fitting that it should be so recognized, especially at this time when we are soon to dedicate the beautiful memorial in his honor which has been erected upon the banks of the Potomac. The bill in its application is confined to the District of Columbia and affects only the per diem employees of the Government stationed in Washington and also the employees of the navy yard, the Government Printing Office, and the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. A bill was introduced for this purpose by the gentleman from

New York [Mr. SIEGEL], and to him belongs all the credit for bringing this matter to the attention of Congress. That bill, however, was general in its application. It affected Federal employees everywhere, and the committee thought that it should be confined to the District of Columbia, which would give the necessary Federal recognition without extending unduly the number of holidays throughout the country.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Can the gentleman inform the House as to the number of legal holidays now in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HUSTED. There are six legal holidays in the District of Columbia—Labor Day, Christmas Day, New Year Day, Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, and Independence Day.

Mr. HICKS. As I understand it, Congress has no authority to declare a legal holiday outside of the District of Columbia. Is that correct?

Mr. HUSTED. Of course, it would have authority to allow Federal employees to draw pay without work in other parts of the country than the District of Columbia, and that is what the legislation which I have mentioned does with regard to the other holidays, but this is applicable solely to the District of Columbia and affects solely employees of the Government stationed within the District.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me that it is rather peculiar to have another holiday so soon before Washington's Birthday, and unless there is some real reason for it I can not see the object of providing for another legal holiday for the 105,000 clerks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUSTED. The real reason is the recognition of the birthday of the great emancipator. If that does not appeal to the gentleman as a good and sufficient reason, then I do not see how he can vote for the bill. It does appeal to me as an all-sufficient reason. I think if there is one day in the calendar year which our Government should recognize as a holiday, it is the anniversary of the birth of the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln. If the principles of his life were in force to-day in our national life, many of the problems which seem hard would be very easy of solution.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Why not make it a national holiday for the whole country?

Mr. HUSTED. It is not deemed wise to do that. Twenty-six States have already made it a national holiday. The main idea is to give it Federal recognition, and this bill accomplishes that without placing any undue burden.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield me five minutes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I hail from Illinois. I was acquainted with Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] I heard, at Charleston, Ill., in 1858, one of the joint debates between Lincoln and Douglas. I met Lincoln three or four times subsequent to that. I was a delegate to the Republican State convention held at Decatur when the contest was made between Lincoln and Seward as to which should have the Illinois delegation. Lincoln had it. He was nominated subsequently at Chicago, elected, and now after Washington, if after him, I think he will dwell in history as perhaps the greatest man up to this time, in his service as President, that the Republic has produced. We are just about completing a great memorial in commemoration of Lincoln. I have had the honor, possibly because I hail from Illinois, to be a member of the commission in charge of the construction of that memorial and had much to do in securing it. It is soon to be dedicated, and when it is dedicated that commission will go out of existence.

It looks as though the recommendation of the commission would be that the dedication be held in September. I do not know that that has been permanently decided upon. The date could be changed by the action of the commission to a later day. The memorial will not be ready for dedication before September, however.

There are six annual legal holidays in the District of Columbia, so far as the Government employees are concerned. It looks as though it may be ungracious for me to say a word that might be construed, or whether it might be or not, would be against the enactment of this legislation.

Lincoln has crossed over. We can add nothing to his fame. Thomas Jefferson was a great man and a great President and author of the Declaration of Independence. There is no legal holiday for him. There is none for Hamilton, and for many other great men of the Revolution by which our liberties were acquired, save alone for Washington.

My friend from New York [Mr. HUSTED] says that there are 26 States that have made Lincoln's birthday a legal holiday. I along with others was requested that I favor a bill to make Lincoln's anniversary a legal holiday for the District of Columbia. My notion is that if Lincoln were living to-day he would not favor this legislation. It can add nothing to his memory. It is easy to make legal holidays. This is confined to the District of Columbia. Leave of absence with pay means something. By Executive order every Saturday afternoon, I believe, is a legal holiday; I think not by law, but by the action of the President. There is sick leave of 30 days to Government employees with full pay.

Mr. MADDEN. And 30 days' vacation.

Mr. CANNON. And 30 days' vacation with full pay, I believe, as to all employees of the United States. I have no war to make upon Government employees, but it seems to me that the hundred millions who toil, bearing the present burden that we have, should not be further taxed. I say again, I do not object to anything that will honor the memory of Abraham Lincoln, but I do object that the glorious record of Lincoln should give additional pay without leave to Government employees in the District who already have 30 days' annual leave with full pay and sick leave with full pay, the cost thereof, I believe, to be $600,000 from the Treasury. I was asked to advocate the making of Lincoln's birthday a national holiday. I declined. That is all I desire to say about it. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not care for more than five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, of course it is not within the power of Congress to declare a day a legal holiday throughout the Union. It is possible to declare that Government employees shall not work on a certain day, but it is not within the power of Congress to declare a legal holiday throughout the Union, because that affects bank transactions, which we can not legally affect. I suppose if this bill should pass, Congress would still work on Lincoln's birthday. We who have the power not to work will continue to work. Those who do not have the power not to work desire us to give them the power not to work, but still to draw their pay.

I do not know how long it will take in the history of the world or the history of the Republic to get 30 or 40 holidays declared. There will be an insistent demand from time to time, as there has been in the past, to declare this day and that day a legal holiday. This is not a new proposition. It has been proposed many times that Lincoln's birthday be declared a holiday in the District of Columbia. It has been proposed many times that Columbus Day be declared a legal holiday. There have been a good many other propositions of that sort. These holidays are not declared for the purpose of reverencing the name or the memory of the person for whom the holiday was declared.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I will state to the gentleman that that is my sole purpose.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no; the gentleman did not mention that in his remarks. He mentioned that it was for the purpose of giving a number of Government employees pay without work.

Mr. HUSTED. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I may have misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. I said nothing of the kind. I simply said what the legal effect would be, but that was no part of my purpose.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman may not have the purpose to accomplish the effect, but as for me I usually look at the effect as determining what the purpose is.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly. I am not criticizing the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. No; but I want to make myself clear. It was not my purpose at all to benefit any employee in the District of Columbia, but the existing law makes holidays applicable to a certain class of employees, and so this bill simply applies the existing law in that respect.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very well. The effect of declaring this day a legal holiday will not in the slightest degree add reverence or respect to the name or the memory of Abraham Lincoln. February 12 is just as much reverenced by the people of the land as February 22, which is now declared a legal holiday.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just a question, for information.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not remember all of these holidays. Have we a legal holiday to commemorate the anniversary of the birth or death of Gen. Grant?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. Or McKinley or Garfield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; nor Roosevelt nor Wilson, yet.

Mr. KITCHIN. We may have one in the future of Mr. Wilson.

Mr. DYER. And we may have one for William Jennings Bryan.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If this is done, it will not be long before we have one commemorating the birth of the American President, Mr. Wilson. I think we have gone far enough in the way of legal holidays now, and while I have just as much affection and reverence for the name and memory of Abraham Lincoln as any gentleman in the land, I can see no occasion for the passage of a bill like this.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, it was not the intention of the Committee on the Judiciary in presenting this bill, as has been well stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], to add anything to the worth or character of the great Lincoln. It has been stated by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that there is nothing that the American people, through legislation, can do to enhance the memory of that great man. We of the Judiciary Committee in presenting this bill to the House and urging its enactment into law have had but one single purpose in view, and that was to fix a time for no other purpose than that the whole people of the country, they of this age and generation and generations to come, may stop in their daily pursuit of business, pleasure, and their avocations, and that the children who may come in the future years may all realize the worth and character of Lincoln and know what he did for the world and for humanity. It is a lesson to the people of this country and of the future that this legislation would benefit.

We of the present day can do much good for the masses of our fellow men if we remember the lessons that Lincoln taught, the principles that he preached and that he put into practice. If we would but follow those principles nowadays, we would have law and order and peace and happiness in all the portions of this land, which is not the fact now. We would be rid of differences, as the gentleman from New York well stated, that exist in America to-day. It is for that purpose and the lesson to the patriotic men of America to-day and the future that this legislation will benefit.

The only objection urged is that it will give an additional day off from work to some employees of the Government who happen to be located in the city of Washington.

There are some Members of Congress who take particular pleasure in criticizing the employees in the city of Washington, when as a matter of fact it is well known if they would investigate the employees in the city of Washington they would find that they are of a very high character, that the pay they receive from the Government is very small and meager in comparison to the great service they render. Why all the time criticize the men who are doing such splendid work for the Government as the thousands of employees in the District of Columbia?

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Has the Judiciary Committee considered the advisability of declaring armistice day a holiday?

Mr. DYER. We only consider matters that are presented to the committee and no such bill has been presented to the committee.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the position of Abraham Lincoln is unique in our history. In all the 150 years of the Republic but two men have arisen to such eminence as Washington and Lincoln. The birthday of Washington is in honor of the event of the birth of the Nation; it is concrete and not abstract, it is specific and not general.

As years come and go we begin to recognize its far-reaching effect upon the American people when properly observed. To my mind the question should not be so much as to what we may contribute to the fame and honor of Lincoln, but what the effect may be upon the public if the place which he has already attained in the mind and heart of the American people, yea, in the mind and heart of the world, is properly recognized by the American Congress. I can see in this effort something beyond the holiday for a few workers in the Government for a day; I can see in it that on the 12th of February, in connection with the 22d, we shall agree in directing the minds of the American people along the lines of true Americanism.

Lincoln never forgot that he lived with the common people, and to-day, as no other man, he holds the reverence and love of the American people. He loved the laboring man and the toiling masses of the country. He never deceived, consciously, the laboring people in proposing one thing and then doing another. He holds to the title by which he was known in the early days of his life as honest. He simply stands unique, head and shoulders over all others, save Washington. It seems that we should honor him as we have honored the Father of his Country. Both are so closely linked with the history of our country that they rise far above other men whom the Republic has honored. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD had leave to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, 26 States in the Union, containing more than two-thirds of the population of the United States, have passed laws making Lincoln's birthday a legal holiday. For the first time since legislation along these lines has been enacted by the various States the question has been brought to the front that it is being asked for and sought solely for the purpose of relieving 100,000 employees from work for a single day in the District of Columbia. It is true that I am a born and bred New Yorker. It is true that New York City first urged this legislation. It is true that I introduced similar bills in the Sixty-fourth, Sixty-fifth, and Sixty-sixth Congresses. It is true that all the patriotic societies of New York and all real Americans, who honored and loved the one great citizen who saved the Union in its critical hour, who lived to give freedom to over 3,000,000 human beings, are appealing for this legislation. I am ready and willing to assume the responsibility for it, as I do. It is exceedingly regrettable, too, that those who come from the great State of Illinois, which Lincoln left in February, 1861, to take up his large burdens and responsibilities here in Washington as President, should be amongst those foremost in opposition to this legislation. When Lincoln left Springfield on February 11, 1861, he said:

> To-day I leave you. I go to assume a task more difficult than that which devolved upon Gen. Washington. Unless the great God who assisted him shall be with and aid me, I must fail; but if the same Omniscient Mind and Almighty Arm that directed and protected him shall guide and support me, I shall not fail—I shall succeed. Let us all pray that the God of our fathers may not forsake us now. To Him I commend you all. Permit me to ask that with equal sincerity and faith you will invoke His wisdom and guidance for me.

He never came back to Springfield, except when the people of America were mourning him after he had been assassinated here in the District of Columbia on the evening of April 14, 1865. Here he passed away in the morning of April 15, 1865, and on that very morning Garfield, speaking in New York, uttered that famous phrase:

> God reigns and the Government at Washington still lives.

How I wish and hope that our people might remember those words daily.

We have passed through a great war, and all over this country we have been preaching Americanism. And what do we imply by Americanism? A knowledge of our country's Constitution, what this Republic stands for, and a knowledge of what those men were who lived to make this Republic great. I know of no man who has rendered a greater service for America than Lincoln. On September 22 of this year we expect to dedicate a great Lincoln Memorial, erected here near the Potomac, upon the anniversary of the day when he signed his famous Emancipation Proclamation. Shall it then be said that here in the District of Columbia, where he did his great work, where he did more for the Republic than any other man has done, here where he passed away at a premature age, although ripe in experience and honor, that this birthday should not be observed, and that in 26 of the States of the Union it should be observed? Mr. Speaker, we observe other holidays in the District of Columbia. Some of them have come into existence through the attaching of riders to bills providing appropriations, yet this House passed that legislation. This House never raised a single word against the passage of such riders, and it seems to me that the time has come when Lincoln's birthday should be made a legal holiday in the District of Columbia as well. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, three years ago I referred at length to the achievements of Abraham Lincoln, and from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 12, 1917, I take the following:

"During all the four years of that terrible, irrepressible conflict he constantly hoped and prayed that the Union would be preserved, and that when the time would arrive for him to hand over the reins of government to his successor, it would be a united Nation that would greet him. The battle had been fought and the victory was his, but like Moses he was not destined to reap the harvest.

"In the short span of 56 years, having first seen the light of day on February 12, 1809, he wrote his name on the pages of history in such a way that time can not efface it. To have been merely the savior of the Union would have entitled him to the lasting, generous regard of generations yet unborn, but to have been the one who freed 3,000,000 men from the bondage of slavery was bound to win him such a measure of fame as to forever make his name secure not only in the hearts of his countrymen but in the memory of all mankind.

"Where can you find a man whose patriotism has not been strengthened and his pulse quickened whenever he has read or heard Lincoln's Gettysburg address? Longer speeches have been made, but no orator pleading for the highest interests of the Republic has ever been equal to that address, either for purity of language or for sounding a clarion note to citizens to rally to the defense of the Union.

"In a few minutes of time one is unable to give full expression to that nobleness of character that was his by nature; to that spirit of mercy displayed by him on many an occasion when some poor, unknown mother appealed to him to save her boy from death after having been condemned by court-martial; to his constant and abiding faith in Him that guides not only the destinies of men but nations as well; to that inborn wit and humor that immediately removed the seriousness on the faces of the members of his Cabinet; and to his genuine loyalty to the generals in the United States Army who achieved victories.

"Fifty years have come and passed away since Lincoln was taken from us. The Union has grown larger and stronger each year. The bitterness of civil strife has gradually melted away until now all men, whether descendants of those who fought for the gray or those who battled for the blue, have come to recognize the greatness of the man who stood by the helm of the ship of state during the four trying years of 1861 to 1865.

"Men have commenced to judge him rightly until now in more than half of the States in the Union his birthday is observed as a legal holiday. I am looking forward to the time, and I believe it will be very shortly, when Congress will take action toward observing the day in the same manner in the city of Washington. Then indeed shall we have visible evidence and give proof to the world that the men of the South and the North have at last joined hands in acknowledging Lincoln's greatness and able achievements and at the same time forever cement the ties that bind us together as a Nation, so that this 'Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth,' but shall always be a power seeking to be at peace with the world, at the same time commanding universal respect for our flag both at home and abroad.

"Men and rulers may come and go, but as long as men can read so long will Abraham Lincoln's loving memory and his noble deeds survive.

"Mr. Speaker, a year ago the Outlook published an article on Abraham Lincoln, by Mr. E. S. Nadel, so full of recollections and comparisons of Abraham Lincoln that I deem it worthy of being read here.

"I. LINCOLN AND STANTON.

"I am indebted to a friend, who was not one of Lincoln's admirers, for the following:

"'When the last call for troops was made and a conscription ordered, the proportion assigned to the city of New York was some thousands in excess of what some people believed to be our legal liability, and our committee on volunteering were certain they could prove this if they could have access to the books of the War Department. The committee—Orison Blunt, John Fox, Smith Ely, and William W. Tweed—went to Washington and asked Secretary Stanton's permission to examine the records, which was brusquely refused on the pretext that the books were in constant use. The committee then went to the White House and saw Lincoln in his private office. After asking them to be seated, he resumed his chair, in which he sat partly on his back, with his heels literally on the mantelpiece. His linen bosom was unbuttoned, exposing his red flannel shirt. He was told that we had furnished, in excess of previous calls, more than enough to exempt us from the present call, which we would prove if we could have access to the records for any two hours during the night when they were not in use. He was also assured that in no event would a conscription be needed in New York, as we were getting 50 volunteers daily, and a short postponement of the draft would enable us to supply all the demands, just or unjust. He listened with an expression of profound sadness, and said he thought the request a reasonable one, but he feared if the order for a draft was postponed volunteering would cease. He said that a similar committee from Cincinnati had applied to him for a postponement of the draft, as they were getting 20 volunteers a day. It was done, and the day following not a single volunteer appeared. "That," said Lincoln, "is human nature. When you think death is after you, you run; but as soon as death stops, you stop." At this he sprang from his chair, throwing his arms about, and laughed loudly at his own dismal joke. Lincoln gave the New York committee a note to Stanton, substantially as follows:

"'"DEAR SECRETARY: These gentlemen from New York ask only what I think is right. They wish access to the records, with two accountants, for two hours at any time to-night. I have told them that they may have double that time.

"'"Yours, A. LINCOLN."

"'They took the note to Stanton, who handed it to Frye. The latter glanced at it and saying, "Take seats," left the office. In a few minutes he returned and said curtly, "The order is annulled; you can't see the books." The committee withdrew and returned to New York the next forenoon. The clerk of the committee, Eugene Durbin, said that late in the evening an Army officer with two orderlies called at the committee's rooms and presented the chairman with a note, which read as follows: "The Secretary of War expects to be informed that the committee on volunteering from the county of New York have left Washington prior to noon to-morrow." The committee, after their return, said it was Stanton, and not Lincoln, who was President of the United States.

"'The gentleman to whom I am indebted for this—Mr. Smith Ely, a former mayor of New York and a Member of Congress—was a Democratic political leader of war times, and, although one of the most amiable and kind-hearted of men, had, of course, to some degree the feelings regarding Lincoln shared by the men who in those days frequented the Manhattan Club. He does not see much point in Lincoln's remark about death and the draft. To me the point seems clear enough. "When the devil was sick, the devil a saint would be," etc. Nor will the reader conclude with the committee that Stanton was President and not Lincoln. Stanton was a man of great administrative ability, kind of human dynamo, such as you could hardly duplicate in the country, a patriot, and honest man besides. As long as the issue was one of no great importance—which seems to have been the case here—Lincoln let him have his way.

"'Stanton was probably the greatest man in civil life produced by the war—of course, after Lincoln. My earliest recollection of him is seeing him at the trial of Sickles for the murder of Key, which took place when I was a boy at school in Washington. He was one of Sickles's counsel. The acquaintance which Sickles formed at that time with Stanton was in part the cause of Sickles's success as a soldier in the Civil War. Stanton advanced and supported him. I remember at the trial a thickset man with a heavy beard, who sat behind the other lawyers, and who would occasionally interpolate a remark in a gruff voice. He had that physical build which is said to be one of the best for strength—very broad shoulders and deep chest, a large body set on short, stout legs. He had Herculean powers of labor. I suppose he was honest, but I do not suppose that he was an overscrupulous man. He would have been out of place as war minister if he had been. When some one complained to him of Gen. Meigs, who was one of his subordinates, he said, "Now, don't say anything against Meigs; he's the best man I have; he is a soldier and can do things which I as a lawyer find it hard to do." One wonders what the things were that Stanton would not do.

"'I am able to make only one original contribution to the history of Stanton. A young girl once told me this incident about him. The reader, of course, knows Coleridge's poem beginning—

"'All thoughts, all passions, all delights,
Whatever stirs this mortal frame,
Are but the minister of love,
And feed his sacred flame.

"'This girl's father was a client and a great friend of Stanton's, and she used to make long visits to Stanton's family during the war. She was a pretty girl and a belle of those days. She said that Stanton worked all the time, and that the only relaxation he allowed himself was that on Sunday afternoon for an hour or so he would read poetry to her, and she told me that the poem he read oftenest and with the greatest pleasure was "All thoughts, all passions, all delights."

"II. LINCOLN AND FORESIGHT.

"'It is strange that Lincoln with his thoughtfulness should not have in some degree foreseen the approach of secession and war. He had been in Congress and must have known the southern people fairly well. He was undoubtedly a foreseeing kind of man. No one saw more clearly than he did that the country could not continue to exist "half free and half slave." It seems strange, therefore, that he had not some notion of what was coming. But who does foresee what is ahead? Benjamin Franklin was a foreseeing kind of man, one would suppose. He spent a number of years in France before the revolution, knew the country well, and was on intimate terms with the leading people of France. He remained there till 1785. In eight years from that time the King's head was off; and yet the wise, observant, thoughtful, and presumably far-sighted Franklin never seems in the least to have suspected what was coming. The French Revolution would indeed have been very difficult to foresee, as perhaps our Civil War was in a less degree. But there are other things not so difficult to know beforehand which are not foreseen. I was in the House of Commons one night during the Franco-Prussian War when Vernon Harcourt, who was at that time unconnected with the Government, accused the Government of shortsightedness in not foreseeing the war, implying that he had foreseen it. Robert Lowe, an extremely clever man, got up to answer for the Government, and said: "Because the gentleman foresaw this war, he thinks that everybody else should have been as clever as he was. I am free to say, however, that the whole thing was a complete surprise to me." Men are always too busy with present matters to bother with what is problematical. Take the case of the present war. Half a dozen European nations have each been holding for 40 years a loaded pistol with the finger on a hair trigger, and yet how surprised we were when, in the lapse of time, one of the pistols went off. Much had been said about "the next war," but have we not put the prophecies regarding it in much the same category as that of the destruction of the world by fire? The ancients, in their deep, attentive knowledge of human nature, said that the gods bestowed upon Cassandra the gift of prophecy, but they coupled the gift with the condition that her prophecies should not be believed. Is that not so of all prophets? They are always regarded as bores or cranks.

"'There were, however, some prescient souls who did foresee our great struggle. Webster, no doubt, had some prevision of that conflict in which his only son was to die—"When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven," etc. Mr. S. J. Tilden said to John Bigelow some years before the war: "If Mr. Bryant and those who think as he does succeed in what they are about, the streets of this city will run red with blood." They did run red during the draft riots, much redder than is commonly understood. Mr. Loyall Farragut tells me that his father, Admiral Farragut—then Capt. Farragut—and he were on the balcony of the old Metropolitan Hotel in Broadway one night in 1858 and were looking at a Republican torchlight procession, when his father said: "I don't like these marching men. It looks to me like war."

"'My father had a friend, John Heart, who was a Federal officeholder at Washington under Buchanan. He was from South Carolina, and had been the editor of the Charleston Mercury. He came to pay us a visit in Brooklyn in the summer of 1860. He had just been in Charleston, and from what he told us we could have no doubt that South Carolina would secede if Lincoln were elected. I had been lately much in the South, and, although only 17 years old, knew enough of the temper and characteristics of the southern people to be aware that, secession once started, it would be very difficult to prevent the spread of it. But youth is sanguine and precipitate. I wanted to see the power of slavery curtailed and was willing to take the chances, and other boys and young men felt as I did.

"'Calhoun, perhaps the most prescient of American statesmen, foresaw the struggle and wanted to bring on the war before the strength of the rapidly growing North should prove too great to be withstood by the South. The scheme of the North should have been to put off the struggle as long as possible for the same reason. If Calhoun saw what was for the interest of the South, it should not have required superhuman intelligence on the part of the North to see where its interest lay. No one, however, at the North seemed to see this point quite as sharply defined as Calhoun did. But there were those in the North who saw that greater danger, perhaps disunion and war, would follow anti-slavery agitation, and who wished to adhere to the status quo, preferring postponement and the chances of the future to the present probabilities of secession and war.

"'But would it have been possible, after the repeal of the Missouri compromise, to put off the war? If Douglas, the marplot, or demagogue, or egotist, or whatever he was, could have been suppressed, it might have been possible to postpone the war for four or eight years, or even longer. But with the repeal once passed, and Pandora's box open, and the newspapers and all the poets and orators hounding the country on to war, was it possible to do it? You can not teach tact and discretion to 20,000,000 people. One night in Plymouth Church in Brooklyn, a few weeks before John Brown's execution—so a friend told me who was there—Wendell Phillips, a Massachusetts man, said: "The State proclamations of Massachusetts conclude with the words, 'God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts'; but if Massachusetts allows John Brown to be hanged, I say, 'God damn the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.' The effect of this spoken to a vast, crowded, and sympathetic audience with the utmost passion by a perfectly honest fanatic, who was at the same time an incomparable orator, may be easily conceived. When such incidents were possible, war could not be far off. If the war was to come, Lincoln was the perfect and apparently heaven-appointed leader, and it was perhaps fortunate that he was no wiser in advance than he was.

"III. WASHINGTON AND LINCOLN.

"'We are fortunate to have had in our short career two such characters as Washington and Lincoln. England has had only one, Alfred. Washington was, of course, a man of much less salient characteristics than Lincoln. The young Chastellux found "his distinction to be in the harmonious blending of his characteristics rather than in the existence of marked special qualities." So he has always seemed to his countrymen, but he probably had more pronounced qualities than we have supposed. Albert Gallatin said that of all the inaccessible people he ever knew, Washington was the most inaccessible. Gallatin, however, knew him as a young man and was not by way of knowing him well. That could not have been the opinion of the farmer Burns, a neighbor of Washington, who once said to him, "Where would you have been if the widow Custis hadn't married you?"

"'There grew up an idea that Washington was colorless. Carlyle, for instance, said of him that "George was just Oliver with the juice left out." That is, of course, untrue. He is not so visible as Lincoln, has not Lincoln's gift of familiarity. In order to get a clear idea of him we should have to follow him more closely than it would be necessary to do with Lincoln. But as we did so, we should, of course, find him a man of marked qualities. I have always found that men are more individual than they are thought to be. As you look at them, closely marked traits begin to define themselves. It would be so in the case of this great man. I am sure also that as we followed him closely we should grow very fond of him. We should perhaps find him pleasanter company than Lincoln. For one thing, he was handsome; he had a person worthy to be the tenement of a mind and character as great as his. Washington, however, had not at all a great opinion of himself. He does not seem to have set even a fair estimate upon his own powers. Says one who has made a study of him: "There seems to be no doubt that to the day of his death he was the most determined skeptic as to his fitness for the positions to which he was called in succession." That we know was not Lincoln's feeling. Lincoln probably knew perfectly well what he was.

"'Washington had not in the least Lincoln's humor. One of Washington's foibles, by the way, was a disposition to shine as a wit, a disposition which was a source of disturbance to his admirers, some of whom had come overseas to set eyes upon the most illustrious man of his age. But you and I find this and his other foibles pleasant, because they bring him nearer to us.

"'Washington was himself of a happy disposition. He appreciated the good things of this world. He was a mundane person, and there is something cheerful in that. Thackeray hinted that in his marriage he was not insensible to the fact that the widow Custis had a hundred thousand dollars—a great sum in those days. People here were indignant at the suggestion when it was made. I am indignant myself, and yet the promptitude with which his heart declared itself when he saw the widow, taken in connection with the fact that the other lady for whom he entertained a tender sentiment, Miss Phillipse, was also an heiress, does look as if he had his wits about him. But why object to this? It was in character. Why object to what is in character, and why hesitate to recognize it?

"'Both Lincoln and Washington were men from the farm and the country; both were physically strong men. Washington was 6 feet 3. Lafayette said of him that his hands were the largest he ever saw. He was a skillful horseman. People said that scarcely anyone had such a grip with his knees as he had. He could ride anything; all that he asked of a horse was that he should go forward. He had a passion for horses; of this the following incident is an illustration. Like most men who have accomplished much, he believed there was a right and a wrong way of doing things, and he had a strong feeling that they should be done the right way. A tradition, which I have had from a lady connected with Washington's family and which I have not seen in print, is that he would go into the stable and pass a silk handkerchief over the coats of the horses; if he found dust on the handkerchief, the groom would catch it.

"'Both Washington and Lincoln were prudent men in money matters. In Washington's case this story may be related as an instance. I have seen several versions of it. The following will do as well as any: Young Mr. Lewis was dining at Mount Vernon. Washington said he was looking for a pair of horses. Some one said that Mr. Lewis had a fine pair. Lewis said, "Yes; I have a good pair, but they cost something, and Gen. Washington will never pay anything." At that the clock on the mantelpiece struck. It was a cuckoo clock, the gift, perhaps, of some European admirer. (This story will illustrate as well Washington's propensity to make bad jokes.) The cuckoo came out and crowed the hour. Washington said, "Ah, Lewis, you're a funny fellow; that bird is laughing at you."

"'There is one difference between Washington and Lincoln which is characteristic and important. Washington was an aristocrat; an upright, downright English gentleman, much resembling the Englishmen of the revolution of 1688, which was a Protestant gentleman's revolution. He was an aristocrat, but with a difference. A fine gentleman of that day would probably have thought him a countryman. I saw lately that Josiah Quincy, who had known him, said that he gave the impression of a man who had not been much in society. I should think that that was true. One has an impression that he was, in a noble way, a rustic. He was an English country gentleman, with a little of Sir Roger de Coverley about him. But he was much more than that. On this basis there was superposed something of Leatherstocking and something of Cincinnatus.

"'But he was essentially an aristocrat. Read his letters, and you will see that the tone of them is unmistakably aristocratic. He belonged to a world of classes, a world in which the existence of classes was the natural and inevitable order of things. But a new society was about to grow up, and it was right that this society should have its great man. In the older society the feeling of the upper class was one of marked separation from the common people. The feeling of that class was, consciously or unconsciously, that it was the business of the poor to be unhappy. A great man of the old time could not altogether escape this feeling. There had been plenty of good and kind rulers in the past, but their feeling in regard to the common people could not be the same as if they had themselves been of that class. Lincoln, on the other hand, was of that class. In him we have a great man unlike the good rulers of the past, not a Haroun-al-Raschid mixing with his people or an Alfred burning the cakes, but the real thing. The fact that he was from that class, that he belonged to it not only by birth and experience but by nature (for birth would not have been sufficient if it had not been that in his heart and his profound sympathies he was a democrat to the core), was an important element of his fame.

"'Of course, it is Lincoln's power of sympathy that attracts men. But that would not of itself have been enough. What endears Lincoln especially to men is the union of sympathy with faith and great strength. It is very unusual to find these qualities united. In the list of English and American worthies I can think of but one other who was like him in this respect. I mean Dr. Johnson. Scott had this union of qualities, although in a less degree; and I have sometimes had a fancy, if there be not a certain temerity in the suggestion, that you might descry some such association of characteristics in the vast and vague personality that lies remote and in shadow behind the writings of Shakespeare. But in Lincoln and Johnson it is clear and marked, and it is the reason of their great power of winning affection. Men wish to attach themselves to such characters. The thought of each man is, "He would have been my friend."

"'The peculiar character of Lincoln's genius also was in part the cause of his power of winning our affection. No great public man has had such strong human intuitions. Certainly no man in our history is his equal in that respect.

"'It appears from the recent life of Hay that it took Lincoln's secretaries a year or more to find out that their chief was a great man, and that they found it out before other people did. In talking with people who knew Lincoln before the war, most of whom are now gone, it has always been easy for me to see that they thought the modern notion of him extravagant. They may have had some jealousy of him or may have felt something of pique and vexation that they had not been clever enough to find out all this for themselves, but that was what they thought. Of course, they were too prudent to say that, but you could see it in their faces. The devotion of the people of this country to Lincoln is, however, not merely a matter of opinion. He has got hold of their hearts as no other American ever did, not even Washington, and he has held them for 50 years, and there is no indication that this sentiment is on the wane.'

"The Washington Herald on February 7, 1917, printed the following:

"'MAN WHO HELPED EVERYBODY.

"'[By Orison Swett Marden.]

"'One of the most beautiful examples of magnanimity in confessing past injustice and acknowledging a tremendous change of feeling toward Lincoln was the utterance of the London Punch years ago. In its recantation of the sneering criticism and caricature with which it had relentlessly pursued him Punch said:

"'Yes, he lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil and confute my pen—
To make me own this kind of princes peer,
This rail splitter—a true born king of men.

"'As the stress and anxiety of the Great War increases one of the most noticeable things in England is its increasing admiration and appreciation of the greatness of Abraham Lincoln.

"'Leading English publications recently printed long articles about him, and English statesmen have quoted his words and acts as precedents for their guidance in momentous crises developed during the war.

"'The reason why Lincoln is so loved and admired to-day, not only by the people of his own land but by the people of every land on the earth, was never more clearly and briefly stated than in those words by a well-known Chinese diplomat.

"'In an address to the Union League Club of Brooklyn on the ninety-second anniversary of Lincoln's birthday Mr. Wu Ting-Fang, then the Chinese minister to the United States, said: "To Lincoln may be applied the words which a Chinese historian uses in describing the character of Yao, the most revered and honored of the ancient rulers of China: 'His benevolence was boundless, his wisdom was profound, to anyone approaching him he had the genial warmth of the sun.' When viewed at a distance he seemed to have the mysterious warp of the clouds; though occupying the highest station, he was not haughty; though controlling the resources of the whole Nation, he was not lavish; justice was the guiding principle of his actions; nobleness was written on his face."

"'That "nobleness was written on every lineament of his face" and that he was destined for greatness was apparent to the reader of character when Lincoln was still a youth.

"'Capt. John Le Mar tells us that one day while riding with his father past where young Lincoln was working, his father said to him in simple western fashion, "John, look at that boy yonder and mark my words he will make a smart man of himself. I may not live to see it, but you see if my words don't come true."

"'Lincoln was loved in his lifetime and is loved to-day as perhaps no other man on this continent was ever loved, because of his genial, lovable disposition and his rare spirit of helpfulness. His spontaneous desire to help everybody, and especially to return a kindness, endeared him to all who knew him. His desire to serve, in youth as in later life, amounted to a passion with him. He chopped wood for the poor widows in his neighborhood, helped those who were out of work, ran errands, did chores for people, and in fact was known as "the man who helped everybody."

"'Herndon, his law partner, said: "When the Rutledge Tavern, where Lincoln boarded, was crowded, Lincoln would often give up his bed and sleep on the counter in his store with a roll of calico for his pillow. Somehow, everybody in trouble turned to Lincoln for help."

"'No man hated deception of any kind or loved truth more than he did. One simple illustration of this trait might be studied with advantage by glib political campaign managers of to-day. When John L. Scripp, of the Chicago Tribune, had written up a little biographical sketch of Lincoln for campaign purposes, Lincoln asked to see advance sheets of the book. After reading them he sent for Scripp and said to him: "That paragraph wherein you state that I read Plutarch's Lives was not true when you wrote it, for up to that moment of my life I had never seen that great contribution to human history. But I want your book, even if it is nothing more than a campaign sketch, to be faithful to the facts, and, in order that the statements in it might be literally true, I secured a copy of Plutarch's Lives a few weeks ago and have sent for you to tell you that I have just read it through."

"'The keynote of Lincoln's greatness, of his success from first to last, is to be found in his own memorable words, "I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to what light I have. I must stand with anybody that stands right."

"Mr. Speaker, a year ago the New York Evening Sun published an editorial entitled—

"'THE LIVING LINCOLN.

"'Better than all printed biographies are the renewals and continuations of the lives of greater men in the lives of the less. No other American, and very few men of any nation or period have entered so intimately into the personal experience of millions as Abraham Lincoln. The words of him who never had a year in school are used in teaching college students the highest possibilities of language. His coined phrases are worn smooth and dateless in current speech. But more than that, his habit of thought has guided the thinking of errand boy and President. His faith quickens the faith of us all. Shelley wrote of Keats:

"He is made one with nature: there is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder to the song of night's sweet bird;
He is a presence to be felt and known
In darkness and in light, from herb and stone,
Spreading itself where'er that Power may move
Which has withdrawn his being to its own;
Which wields the world with never-wearied love,
Sustains it from beneath and kindles it above."

"'In such wise the man whose birth we celebrate to-day has entered into the life of his people and is in process of penetrating the wider circles of the whole world's life. This, on its earthward side, is the immortality of Abraham Lincoln.

"'But if ever something more than a vague admiration for a historic figure was needed it is now. The materials are at hand for such intimate and complete knowledge of the man as will expand the intellect and elevate the standards of our voters, aiding them in coming to decisions on the vital issues of the most anxious period since the Civil War. Lincoln is worth knowing well. "Thorough" was one of his own great words. Any man or woman that will give the spare evenings of the next year, or the next five years, to his life and writings will be the better and the happier for it. The Nation will be the stronger for a body of citizens equipped with such knowledge.

"'The man had a thousand little Boswells but no great one. It is the readers' task to make his own unification of the recorded facts, correcting each account by the weight of testimony. Some 1,500 books or pamphlets have been issued dealing with the various phases of the subject. Naturally a large proportion of this literature may be thrown aside. But this must be done with care, for sometimes it is worth reading a whole volume for one sentence.

"'Nicolay and Hay furnish the largest bulk of material. The seeker after Lincoln himself can not help wishing that they had felt a less heavy weight of responsibility for the political history of the period. Much of the best matter is in John Hay's footnotes—extracts from his diary. And Hay put many of his vividest impressions into a separate paper published later in the Century (1890).

"'Stoddard, another secretary, has left a few precious pages, notably those in which he tells of the Commander in Chief's lonely all-night march up and down his room collecting his own forces after Chancellorsville. ("Inside the White House in War Times.")

"'Noah Brooks had the exceptional fortune of almost daily intercourse, and he has done as much as any witness to call back the very expression of the man's face, the sound of his voice, and his individual modes of thought and expression. These hints are to be found in the book, Washington in Lincoln's Time, and in various magazine articles which have not been reprinted—Harper's Monthly of July, 1865, and Scribner's of February and March, 1878, and August, 1879.

"'Six Months in the White House, by Carpenter, who painted the picture of the Cabinet discussing emancipation, has perhaps as many good stories as any of the source books. There are three or four collections of short papers—the ones published first in the North American Review ("Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln by distinguished men of his time"), Oldroyd's "Immortelles" and Dr. William Hayes Ward's "Tributes," first published in the Independent.

"'L. E. Chittenden contributed the beautiful story of William Scott, the classic instances of pardon, and a clear inside view of the Treasury situation leading up to the break with Chase.

"'Col. A. K. McClure's "Lincoln and men of war times" naturally gives an unusual amount of political information, from the campaign crisis that led to Lincoln's nomination down to the substitution of Johnson for Hamlin, which left deep marks on the history of the following period.

"'The diary of Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, which was published only a few years ago, can not be neglected as primary source; nor can Welles's paper in the Galaxy of April, 1872, which gives perhaps the most complete account of the last Cabinet meeting and of Lincoln's plans for reconstruction. In that contemporary account it is made clear that the liberator of the slaves was not in favor of insisting that the States about to be reorganized should give the vote at once to freedmen. He simply expressed the desire and the hope that those who had proven their fitness should be rewarded by full citizenship.

"'David Homer Bates, in his Lincoln in the Telegraph Office, pictures the scene in which the emancipation proclamation was wrought out.

"'Grant's Memoirs furnishes a sidelight or two, and Blaine's Twenty Years in Congress is one of the most admirably balanced presentations of the legislative aspects of the war, with clear pictures of many leading men. The later controversies in which Blaine was involved should not be permitted to obscure his value as a historian.

"'Immediately after the war J. G. Holland gathered from living witnesses fresh impressions of Lincoln, many of which are more convincing than some of the later testimony. Ida Tarbell did a great service in gathering facts that had remained unpublished down to our own day.

"'These are by no means all even of the primary sources, but they are enough to blaze for the reader a trail through the biographical tangle. It is fair to add the name of one of the few books that attempt analysis—Rothschild's Lincoln, Master of Men.

"'But if the choice must be made between the books other men have written about him and Lincoln's own words, the letters and addresses hold first place. He can be trusted as the best witness in his own case. His word was as good as his bond, and his life was as good as his word. Speech was the water from a living well, under which the stream of character never failed.

"'Probably the majority of men desire to be counted on the side of truth. But few will make any great effort to find what is true. And, as Sir Thomas Browne declares, not every man is a fit champion of truth. For when the man who is right in principle fails in the trial by combat, the cause suffers in his defeat.

"'Abraham Lincoln was not a speculative philosopher, an originator of systems of thought. But he was one of the greatest exponents and defenders of truth in its applications and illustrations in human experience that the world has ever seen. His life and words—which are inseparable—perfectly teach the balance between thought and act, principle and practice, general truth and particular fact.

"'As a boy he was irritated by the lack of clearness in the talk of his elders. He determined to find words that should tell to other men what was in his own mind so that nobody could misunderstand him. He held to that resolve. And with it went the passion for clear thinking.

"'The Cooper Union speech is perhaps the best illustration of what has just been affirmed. Lincoln probably took more pains with it than with any other single production. Note how he divides his main subject into three or four allied themes, establishes the facts on which his argument is to be based, and joins the whole structure. He takes his opponent's words for a beginning:

"'"Our fathers when they framed the Government under which we live understood this question just as well and even better than we do now."

"'This sentence he repeats wholly or in part about twenty times, with illustrations and reinforcement. His second theme is the question:

"'"Does the proper division of local from Federal authority, or anything in the Constitution, forbid our Federal Government to control as to slavery in our Federal Territories?"

"'This he repeats or refers to nearly a score of times, interweaving it with the first theme as Bach would compose a fugue. The result is perfection, and to perfection there is no answer. His address is a model for all discussion in public or in private. And it is a helpful model, because it does not require genius to follow it.

"'The same is true of the letters, which are full of keen and kindly applications to the life of each one of us and of the whole people. Even with Gettysburg and the second inaugural in mind, we have found a more nearly complete and satisfying expression of the man in his letters than in his addresses. In them he confounds the enemies of the Republic, admonishes, warns, and instructs his people, and comforts the broken-hearted with a tenderness that had blossomed upon the graves of Nancy Hanks and Ann Rutledge and upon those of his children.

"'For in this man reason and emotion were joined like form and color in a flower. He rejoiced in the exercise of his mind, but he had none of that intellectual arrogance that denies all it can not comprehend or prove. The charge of atheism is the most futile of all that have been brought against him. As an inquiring boy he read Tom Paine and wrote an essay along radical lines, but the pressure of human need constrained him to turn to Divinity.

"'Prayer was the very breath of his later life. Gen. Daniel Sickles was hardly the man to invent a pious tale. He has repeated to many witnesses the story of Lincoln's prayer before Gettysburg. But it is inconceivable that so honest a man could write his reverent expressions of trust in the Almighty without a personal sense of relationship.

"'The two men of the nineteenth century who have drawn and held the most intense admiration of the civilized world are Napoleon Bonaparte and Abraham Lincoln. Both were great leaders, great executives. Both had the power of binding their followers to them with a personal loyalty stronger than the ties of blood. Both appeal to the imagination of millions who never saw them.

"'But, as the Evening Sun pointed out on the anniversary of Waterloo, it is the downfall of Napoleon that the world remembers, the long-deferred but inevitable defeat of ambition. Lincoln died victorious, not alone in the circumstance of triumphant arms and a Nation reunited but in the victory of unselfish devotion to the cause of human freedom. He identified his life with the progress of mankind, and in losing himself he found immortality.

"'A modest autobiography which Lincoln penned at the request of a political friend at Springfield, Ill., on December 20, 1859, is as follows:

"'"I was born February 12, 1809, in Hardin County, Ky. My parents were both born in Virginia, of undistinguished families—second families, perhaps, I should say. My mother, who died in my tenth year, was of a family of the name of Hanks, some of whom now reside in Adams, and others in Macon County, Ill. My paternal grandfather, Abraham Lincoln, emigrated from Rockingham County, Va., to Kentucky about 1781 to 1782, where a year or two later he was killed by the Indians, not in battle but by stealth, when he was laboring to open a farm in the forest. His ancestors, who were quakers, went to Virginia from Berks County, Pa.

"'YOUTH IN BACKWOODS.

"'"My father at the death of his father was but 6 years of age, and he grew up literally without education. He removed from Kentucky to what is now Spencer County, Ind., in my eighth year. We reached our new home about the time the State came into the Union. It was a wild region, with many bears and other wild animals still in the woods. There I grew up. There were some schools, so called, but no qualification was ever required of a teacher beyond readin', writin', and cipherin' to the rule of three. If a straggler supposed to understand Latin happened to sojourn in the neighborhood, he was looked upon as a wizard. There was absolutely nothing to excite ambition for education. Of course, when I came of age I did not know much. Still, somehow, I could read, write, and cipher to the rule of three, but that was all. I have not been to school since. The little advance I now have upon this store of education I have picked up from time to time under pressure of necessity.

"'RAISED TO FARM WORK.

"'"I was raised to farm work, which I continued until I was 22. At 21 I came to Illinois, Macon County. Then I got to New Salem, now in Menard County, where I remained a year as a sort of clerk in a store. Then came the Black Hawk War, and I was elected a captain of volunteers, a success which gave me more pleasure than any I have had since. I went through the campaign, was elated, ran for the legislature the same year (1832) and was beaten—the only time I ever have been beaten by the people. The next and three succeeding biennial elections I was elected to the legislature. I was not a candidate afterwards. During the legislative period I had studied law and removed to Springfield to practice it. In 1846 I was elected to the lower House of Congress. Was not a candidate for reelection. From 1849 to 1854, both inclusive, practiced law more assiduously than ever before. Always a Whig in politics, and generally on the Whig electoral tickets, making active canvasses, I was losing interest in politics when the repeal of the Missouri compromise aroused me again. What I have done since then is pretty well known.

"'PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

"'"If any personal description of me is thought desirable, it may be said I am, in height, 6 feet 4 inches, nearly; lean in flesh, weighing on an average 180 pounds; dark complexion, with coarse black hair and gray eyes. No other marks or brands recollected."

"'History takes up the story where Abraham Lincoln left off, and tells how he was elected President of the United States, how he guided the Nation through the Civil War, how he brought about the abolition of slavery, how he was reelected, and how he was shot down by an assassin, John Wilkes Booth, on the night of April 14, 1865, dying early the next morning.'

"Mr. Speaker, let me read the—

"ODE FOR THE FUNERAL OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

"[By William Cullen Bryant.]

"(Read in New York, Apr. 25, 1865, at the martyred President's obsequies.)

"Oh, slow to smite and swift to spare,
Gentle, and merciful, and just.
Who, in the fear of God, didst bear
The sword of power—a Nation's trust.

"In sorrow by thy bier we stand,
Amid the awe that hushes all,
And speak the anguish of a land
That shook with horror at thy fall.

"Thy task is done—the bond are free—
We bear thee to an honored grave,
Whose proudest monument shall be
The broken fetters of the slave.

"Pure was thy life; its bloody close
Hath placed thee with the sons of light,
Among the noble host of those
Who perished in the cause of right."

Mr. Speaker, some of Lincoln's views are briefly extracted in the following:

"DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

"The assertion 'That all men are created equal' was of no practical use in effecting our separation from Great Britain; and it was placed in the Declaration not for that but for future use. Its authors meant it to be—as, thank God, it is now proving itself—a stumblingblock to all those who in aftertimes might seek to turn a free people back into the hateful paths of despotism. They knew the proneness of prosperity to breed tyrants, and they meant, when such should reappear in this fair land and commence their vocation, they should find left for them at least one hard nut to crack. (Speech at Springfield, Ill., June 26, 1857.)

"Think nothing of me; take no thought for the political fate of any man whomsoever, but come back to the truths that are in the Declaration of Independence. While pretending no indifference to earthly honors, I do claim to be actuated in this contest by something higher than an anxiety for office. I charge you to drop every paltry and insignificant thought for any man's success. It is nothing; I am nothing; Judge Douglas is nothing. But do not destroy that immortal emblem of humanity—the Declaration of Independence. (Speech at Bardstown, Ill., Aug. 12, 1858.)

"I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of the separation of the colonies from the motherland but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty, not alone to the people of this country but, I hope, to the world for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weight would be lifted from the shoulders of all men. (Speech at Independence Hall, Philadelphia, Feb. 22, 1861.)

"THE MAN BEFORE THE DOLLAR.

"* * * The Democracy of to-day hold the liberty of one man to be absolutely nothing when in conflict with another man's right of property. Republicans, on the contrary, are for both the man and the dollar, but in case of conflict the man before the dollar. * * *

"But soberly, it is now no child's play to save the principles of Jefferson from total overthrow in this Nation. * * * This is a world of compensation, and he who would be no slave must consent to have no slave. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and, under a just God, can not long retain it. All honor to Jefferson—to the man who, in the concrete pressure of a struggle for national independence by a single people, had the coolness, forecast, and capacity to introduce into a merely revolutionary document an abstract truth, applicable to all men and all times, and so to embalm it there that to-day, and in all coming days, it shall be a rebuke and a stumblingblock to the very harbingers of reappearing tyranny and oppression. (Letter to Republicans of Boston, Apr. 6, 1859, in reply to an invitation to attend a celebration in honor of Jefferson's birthday.)

"LIBERTY.

"The fight must go on. The cause of civil liberty must not be surrendered at the end of one or even one hundred defeats. (Letter to H. Asbury, Nov. 19, 1858.)

"This declared indifference, but as I must think, covert zeal, for the spread of slavery, I can not but hate. I hate it because of the monstrous injustice of slavery itself. I hate it because it deprives our republican example of its just influence in the world, enables the enemies of free institutions, with plausibility, to taunt us as hypocrites, causes the real friends of freedom to doubt our sincerity, and especially because it forces so many good men among ourselves into an open war with the very fundamental principles of civil liberty, criticizing the Declaration of Independence and insisting that there is no right principle of action but self-interest. (Speech at Ottawa, Ill., Aug. 21, 1858.)

"What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling seacoasts, the guns of our war steamers, or the strength of our gallant and disciplined Army. These are not our reliance against a resumption of tyranny in our fair land. * * * Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in our bosoms. Our defense is in the preservation of the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men in all lands everywhere. Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seeds of despotism around our own doors. (Speech at Chicago, Ill., Sept. 11, 1858.)

"All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years.

"At what point, then, is the approach of danger to be expected? I answer, If it ever reaches us it must spring up among us; it can not come from abroad. If destruction be our lot we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freedmen we must live through all time or die by suicide. (Speech at Springfield, Ill., Jan. 27, 1837.)

"No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent. * * * Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God can not long retain it. (Speech at Springfield, Ill., Oct. 1, 1854.)

"Allow all the governed an equal voice in the Government; that and that only is self-government. * * * Finally, I insist that if there is anything that it is the duty of the whole people to never intrust to hands other than their own that thing is the preservation and perpetuity of their own liberties and institutions. (Speech at Peoria, Ill., Oct. 16, 1854.)

"GOVERNMENT OF, BY, AND FOR THE PEOPLE.

"The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth. (Address on the Gettysburg battle field, Nov. 19, 1863.)

"LABOR AND CAPITAL.

"The strongest bond of human sympathy outside the family relation should be one uniting all working people of all nations, tongues, and kindreds. (Reply to committee of Workingmen's Association, of New York, Mar. 21, 1864.)

"It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing bread from the sweat of other men's faces. (Inaugural address, Mar. 4, 1865.)

"I am glad to see that a system of labor prevails in New England under which laborers can strike when they want to, where they are not obliged to work under all circumstances. (Speech at New Haven, Conn., Mar. 6, 1860.)

"And inasmuch as most good things are produced by labor, it follows that all such things of right belong to those whose labor has produced them. But it has so happened, in all ages of the world, that some have labored and others have, without labor, enjoyed a large proportion of the fruits. This is wrong and should not continue. To secure to each laborer the whole product of his labor, or as nearly as possible, is a worthy object of any good government. (Complete Works, Vol. I, p. 92.)

"We will hereafter speak for freedom and against slavery as long as the Constitution guarantees free speech; until everywhere on this wide land the sun shall shine, and the rain shall fall, and the wind shall blow upon no man who goes forth to unrequited toil. (1856, History of Abraham Lincoln.—Arnold, p. 97.)

"It is not needed nor fitting here that a general argument should be made in favor of popular institutions; but there is one point, with its connections not so hackneyed as most others, to which I ask brief attention. It is the effort to place capital on an equal footing with, if not above, labor in the structure of government. * * * Labor is prior to and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration. * * * No men living are more worthy to be trusted than those who toil up from poverty; none less inclined to take or touch aught which they have not honestly earned. Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they, and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them till all of liberty shall be lost. (From annual message, Dec. 3, 1861.)

"THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

"I go for all sharing the privilege of the Government who assist in bearing its burdens, * * * by no means excluding females. (Announcement of political views, June 13, 1836.)

"I am opposed to the limitation or lessening of the right of suffrage. If anything I am in favor of its extension or enlargement. I want to lift men up—to broaden rather than contract their privileges. (Interview, Springfield, Ill.—Herndon, p. 625.)

"LINCOLN'S IDEA OF FREE GOVERNMENT.

"It has long been a grave question whether any government, not too strong for the liberties of the people, can be strong enough to maintain its existence in great emergencies. On this point the present rebellion brought our Republic to a severe test, and a presidential election, occurring in regular course during the rebellion, added not a little to the strain.

"If the loyal people united were put to the utmost of their strength by the rebellion, must they not fail when divided and partially paralyzed by a political war among themselves? But the election was a necessity. We can not have free government without elections. (Response to a serenade, Nov. 10, 1864.)

"You can better succeed with the ballot. * * * Let there be peace. Revolutionize through the ballot box, and restore the Government once more to the affections and hearts of men by making it express, as it was intended to do, the highest spirit of justice and liberty. (1855, advice to Free Soilers who talked of using force. (Herndon, p. 380.)

"PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S HUMANITY.

"On pardoning 24 deserters at one time, all of whom had been sentenced to be shot, he said to a general who objected:

"'Mr. General, there are already too many widows in the United States. Please don't ask me to add to the number, for I won't do it.'

"To Gen. B. F. Butler, in 1863, when the general asked for the pardon of a man whom he himself had sentenced to be shot:

"'You? Asking me to pardon some poor fellow? Give me that pen.'

"To a friend who had obtained from him a pardon for a deserter, he said:

"'Some of our generals complain that I impair discipline and subordination in the Army by my pardons and respites, but it makes me rested, after a hard day's work, if I can find some good excuse for saving a man's life.'

"THE COURTS AND THE PEOPLE.

"The people of these United States are the masters of both Congresses and courts, not to overthrow the Constitution, but to overthrow the men who pervert the Constitution. (Speech at Cincinnati, Ohio, Sept. 17, 1859.)

"The candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. (Inaugural address, Mar. 4, 1861.)"

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I would like to have your attention. Lincoln only lived 56 years. He died 55 years ago. His short life consists in what he said and what he did. His notable sayings cover but a short period of the 56 years; his doings even a shorter period. Since his death there has been more written about Mr. Lincoln than about any other American who has lived, although others great died many years before and the country has had more time to contemplate the sayings and work of the other men. The Lincoln library, which would be composed of all that has been written of him, would be the largest personal library upon any American who has lived in our country or in any other. Many a time I have tried to answer the question, Why is there such universal interest in Abraham Lincoln? I think it is largely because of the fundamental principles that he announced. There are more quotations from what Mr. Lincoln has said than any other American or from any public man of his day, and yet here is a man who never went to school; six months comprehends his schooling. He never had any chance for refined education, and yet the world will admit that he spoke the purest English of any man who lived in his day. His utterances were brief. He never used an involved sentence. Eighty-five per cent of his words were monosyllables. He is the outstanding figure to-day in all American history as the best example of power in utterance we have in our history, whether he be a litterateur or whether he be a public man in public life. Now, what is the secret? That may never be satisfactorily revealed. It is enough to know it to be true. It is not necessary for me to prove what I have said by repeating anything he said. His utterances were copious for a man in public life. If we take a collection of the sayings of Lincoln, nothing but what he said, we would have a volume. I think Mr. Lincoln's greatest claim in the memory of our Nation is rather in the wonderful utterances that stand alone. In the year 1858, in the debate to which our distinguished ex-Speaker referred, he made one utterance that attracted attention throughout this country and was quoted in the London Times.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, in 1858, when Mr. Lincoln said, "A house divided against itself can not stand," and elaborated upon it, he announced a fundamental principle which determined the issue upon which the Nation ultimately went to war and came out of it a stronger Nation than when it went in. Here was an utterance made by what the world decreed an uneducated man, which made him a figure quoted on two continents.

That same year Mr. Lincoln put a question to Mr. Douglas that could not be answered safely yes or no, and when the friends of Mr. Lincoln said, "Do not push that too far; if you do, you never can be elected Senator," Mr. Lincoln replied, "I am looking for greater gain. If Mr. Douglas answers that question either yes or no, he never can be elected President of the Nation." That same year he submitted, in response to a challenge of Douglas, a series of questions. If you reread them you will see the wonderful grasp of the man's mind. The next year he was invited to speak in New York, and addressed a great mass meeting in Cooper Union. It is a very elaborate speech, and I believe that every Member of the House will concede, if they reread that Cooper Union speech, that it is the finest example of the balanced sentence from a rhetorical standpoint that you will find in any long speech in American literature. That speech left nothing to be said after he got through. He placed the issue so perfectly clear and yet so kindly that he left no sores, but everyone left the meeting thinking upon the issue. An observation concerning Mr. Lincoln was made by a friend, when asked how he distinguished Lincoln from Douglas, to this effect:

> You will always remember that Douglas was a powerful orator, but you can never remember what he said; on the other hand, you were not impressed so much with the oratory of Lincoln, but you would never forget what he said. Douglas spoke rather to be heard, while Lincoln spoke to be understood.

I think that is a very good characterization. Mr. Lincoln's first inaugural address is a fine type of beautiful sentiment, delicately expressed, on a mighty issue, upon which we were going into war, and he spoke in terms not to offend but to plead. His closing sentence in that famous inaugural is one of the beautiful sentences in our literature expressed in the English. You will recall it:

> The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battle field and patriot's grave to every heart and hearthstone throughout this broad land will swell the chorus of the Union when touched again, as it surely will be, by the angels of our better natures.

His second inaugural address, I think, is the high-water mark of all that Mr. Lincoln ever said. His address at Gettysburg is looked upon as the finest short speech ever uttered in the English language. That is the judgment of the critics of Britain. But I think this utterance in the second inaugural is incomparable:

> Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away.

That is a prose poem, and the balance of the address is equally fine.

So I agree with those who do not believe we can add very much to this wonderful memory in the way of monuments and holidays. The only thing I have in mind is that 26 States have already made the date of his birth a holiday, and I think the time will come when every State in the Union will do likewise, and the only governing power in the District of Columbia, where the Capitol is located, is Congress. If the District desires to do what the States have already done this is the only way to proceed. I recognize what has been said, and I hesitate for that reason, since I am agreed that there is too much of a tendency toward vacation days, but I think I shall vote to make it a holiday in order that the Capital may show this respect to the memory of our great American. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, on a certain rainy morning, in the city of Springfield, in the presence of a small assemblage of not more than 200 persons, Mr. Lincoln stood on the rear platform of the rear car of a short and unpretentious train, about to take his departure for Washington, there to take into his firm grasp the quivering helm of the struggling ship of state. There was no great concourse of people; there was no great inspiration; there was absolutely no excitement. From the very depth of his heart and his soul he said substantially these words: "There has fallen upon me a task, my fellow citizens and fellow townsmen, such as did not rest even upon the Father of his Country, and feeling so, I can not but turn and look for help without which I can not perform that great task. I turn, then, and look," he said, "for help to the great American people and to that God who has never forsaken them."

I feel that never does that grand and sublime figure appeal to me more than when I recall those words. You and I know Abraham Lincoln received the help he prayed for. He received it from 20,000,000 loyal hearts; he received it from the Infinite Power on high. He put one hand in the outstretched hand of the American people, and with the other he laid a strong hold on the almighty arm of the Almighty God, and, standing there, supported by humanity and supported by Divinity, he fought the mightiest fight that was ever fought for you and for me, for North and for South, for rich and for poor, that has ever been fought since the Savior walked among the sons of men 2,000 years ago.

It is true, gentlemen, that there rested upon him a task which did not rest even upon the Father of his Country. I speak only with veneration the names of the other Presidents that have been mentioned here to-day, but none of them carried the burdens for you and for me that Lincoln carried.

Many of you here remember John M. Palmer, major general, governor, and Senator, and at one time candidate for President of a great party. In 1865 Gen. John M. Palmer was military governor of Kentucky, with headquarters at Louisville. On the night of the assassination of President Lincoln, when the word came to Gen. Palmer, he endeavored to get to his headquarters——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. YATES. Gen. Palmer, in the effort to get to his headquarters, found the streets filled to the extent of a block in every direction, and he had to get there in a roundabout way. When he finally arrived he found five ex-Confederate brigadiers, and these men said to him, "Oh, Gen. Palmer, those men out in the streets, standing there in the mud and in the silence and in the rain, are our boys," and—Gen. Palmer told me this himself—they further said, "Gen. Palmer, in the death of Abraham Lincoln we believe the sunny South lost its best friend."

Gentlemen, I believe that; I have always believed it. I believe had he lived we never would have had the troubles of reconstruction that we did. There fell upon him a task that did not fall even upon the Father of his Country.

It is perfectly absurd to say that Presidents who have come since ought to have a legal holiday in their honor, when we are speaking the name of Abraham Lincoln. Aside from Washington he was the greatest American that ever walked this earth of ours. [Applause.] And I shall vote now, and as long as I live I shall vote, for anything that will do honor to his memory. It is no answer to say that there are other men deserving of this honor, or that there will be in generations to come. I do not agree with my esteemed friend from Illinois on that point, and I do not think the people of Illinois will agree with him. And I want to say another thing, that if Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson were here to-day they would vote for this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the pending bill to make the 12th day of February, the anniversary of the birth of Lincoln, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

Up to the present time the legislatures of 26 States of the Union have passed laws making Lincoln's birthday a national holiday.

Not only should this be done in the District of Columbia as a further honor to the memory of this great man, but it will also impress upon the coming generations the farseeing wisdom of Lincoln, and the reverence he held toward our institutions, and the ability he had of interpreting the hopes and aspirations of the common people of the land, and his supreme confidence in their wisdom to ultimately solve the many problems in our national life.

In the consideration of the treaty of peace, which has engrossed the attention of the United States Senate for nearly a year, the warning of Washington and Jefferson, and others of the founding fathers, has repeatedly been pointed out.

Lincoln's view as to domestic contentions is best set out in a letter written by William H. Seward, his Secretary of State, to the governor of Maryland shortly after Lincoln was inducted into office, and I desire to incorporate the letter as a part of my remarks as a further evidence of his foresight and statesmanship:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 22, 1861.

His Excellency THOMAS H. HICKS,
Governor of Maryland.

SIR: I have the honor to receive your communication of this morning, in which you inform me that you had felt it to be your duty to advise the President of the United States to order elsewhere the troops then off Annapolis, and also that no more may be sent through Maryland, and that you have further suggested that Lord Lyons be requested to act as mediator between the contending parties in our country to prevent the effusion of blood.

The President directs me to acknowledge the receipt of that communication and to assure you that he has weighed the counsels it contains with the respect which he habitually cherishes for the chief magistrates of the several States, and especially for yourself. He regrets as deeply as any magistrate or citizen of this country can that demonstrations against the safety of the United States, with very extensive preparation for the effusion of blood, have made it his duty to call out the forces to which you allude.

The force now sought to be brought through Maryland is intended for nothing but the defense of the Capital. The President has necessarily confided the choice of the national highway which that force shall take in coming to this city to the lieutenant general commanding the Army of the United States, who, like his only predecessor, is not less distinguished for his humanity than for his loyalty, patriotism, and distinguished public services.

The President instructs me to add that the national highway thus selected by the lieutenant general has been chosen by him, upon consultation with prominent magistrates and citizens of Maryland, as the one which, while a route is absolutely necessary, is farthest removed from the populous cities of the State, and with the expectation that it would therefore be the least objectionable one.

He can not but remember that there has been a time in the history of our country when a general of the American Union with forces designed for the defense of its Capital was not unwelcome anywhere in the State of Maryland, and certainly not at Annapolis, then, as now, the capital of that patriotic State, and then also one of the capitals of the Union.

If 80 years could have obliterated all the other noble sentiments of that age in Maryland, the President would be hopeful, nevertheless, that there is one that would forever remain there and everywhere. That sentiment is that no domestic contention whatever that may arise among the parties of this Republic ought in any case to be referred to any foreign arbitrament, least of all to the arbitrament of a European monarchy.

I have the honor to be, with distinguished consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

I want to call attention to another matter which concerned the great President very deeply, and to which he gave a great deal of thought, and that is the constantly growing number of commissions and boards within the Federal Government.

The founders of the Government, to carry out the high principles laid down by the signers of the immortal declaration, finally agreed upon the present Constitution, which Gladstone declared was the most wonderful work ever struck off by the brain or purpose of man.

In this great document there is provided three separate branches of government, each acting as a check upon the other, and each in turn restricted by the provisions of the Federal Constitution.

It was believed that by these safeguards, by the people passing upon the membership of the House of Representatives every two years, and by the Senate concurring in their work—a Senate elected by the legislatures of the several States—now elected by the people, and each Member thereof elected for a period of six years—that the legislative branches of the Government would be truly responsive to the will of the people, yet, at the same time, be safeguarded against hysteria, or unwise submission to public clamor or pressure.

In addition they provided the safeguards of the Executive veto and judicial interpretation of law by the Supreme Court.

And, under this system of legislative and responsive government, the United States began what was the most pretentious experiment in free government ever inaugurated, and that it has been successful, even beyond the fondest dreams of the founding fathers, no one has ever denied.

But recently there has grown up a new adjunct to the three coordinate branches of government referred to above. This is government by boards, by bureaus, and by commissions. Such agencies had no place in the original scheme of government, nor for many years after its organization, and were frowned upon until quite recently. Lincoln called them "schemes to cheat the Government."

These independent boards and other forms of administrative agencies have had broad powers conferred upon them, especially those created during the period of our participation in the World War; and their chiefs and chairmen have assumed all the powers and dignity of Cabinet officers and department heads, and are now besieging Congress for increased appropriations and personnel, and for extensive powers beyond that conferred upon any other branch of the Government.

The speaker recently made an investigation of the various sums appropriated, and in most cases entirely expended by these boards and commissions, and found that during the present fiscal year there had been made available for the use of these various independent bodies, the sum of $897,101,766, with a strong possibility that some of them would require a deficiency appropriation to finish out the fiscal year.

The above sum does not include the appropriations to the railroads, which now total $1,450,000,000.

When it is considered that this great sum was expended in a year of peace, which did not begin until seven and one-half months after the signing of the armistice, and was therefore not a war-time expenditure, we begin to realize just where we are drifting by setting up these independent governing bodies who are to-day expending more than the entire cost of running the Government a few years ago.

The time is at hand when these various regulatory and supervisory bodies must, for the purpose of curtailing expenditures, and for the added reason that they must be responsible to some authority in the administration of their functions and powers, be merged with the executive departments with responsible heads, who, in turn, are responsible to the President and to Congress and to the people ultimately.

Unless a check is put upon their ambitions and requests we will soon have a Government not of the people but by boards and commissions, each of which is intent upon extending its own jurisdiction, importance, and power, and caring little for the efforts, or the duplication of their own efforts, by other overlapping agencies.

Probably one of the best things done by any American Commonwealth in recent years was when Illinois, a few years ago, finding that there had grown up in that State 125 independent and unrelated agencies of government, abolished them all and created nine departments of State government, each with a responsible head, and under this reorganized their system of State government and finance, and the present administration has given to that State an administration of public affairs of which every Illinoisan is proud; and Illinois is the only State in the Union which has been able to attempt a reduction in the tax rate; yet this Commonwealth has been able, because of salutary reforms inaugurated, to bring about a reduction from 90 cents to 60 cents per hundred dollars of taxable voluation, a decrease of 33⅓ per cent in these days of mounting costs, not the least of which has been the increased cost of government.

To-day in the Federal Government we have much the same situation, and daily there is proposed new schemes and new administrative bodies which it is claimed will cure many or all of the evils which now exist in the body politic.

Under the present administration many men in high places in the Federal Government lie awake at night thinking of schemes which will give new power and larger jurisdiction to the Federal Government, and many of the conclusions they reach and the recommendations they make border upon socialism or communism.

It is for those who believe in the wisdom of the founding fathers, in the soundness of our constitutional form of representative government, in the maxim that the government is only as good or as bad as the people who make up its citizenry, and that they are best governed who are governed least, to call a halt and get back to functioning through the regularly constituted representatives of the people—government by men amenable to and subject to, the Constitution and the statutes and their limitations and restrictions—to repeal the laws creating some of these useless and overlapping and expensively functioning bodies, to the end that we may again return to an annual budget of expenditures in keeping with and within the limits of our income.

This Government existed and prospered and expanded before they were created. It will survive their abolition.

Sane economy and efficiency demand early reorganization. Let us hope that the return to sanity and constituted and responsive authority is at hand.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is important that we should create this holiday for the purpose of honoring Lincoln. I think it is of much more importance and of much greater interest to the living than to the dead. Lincoln's fame is secure. Holidays can do the dead no good. They are intended to create an interest in the ideals, the character, and achievements of the men whom we honor. It makes no difference to Washington to-day whether we celebrate his birthday or not, but it makes a great difference to the people of the United States.

At every recurring anniversary of his birth we sing songs, write editorials, and make speeches in reference to the life, character, and services of that man, and otherwise demonstrate our appreciation of his worth. It is for that purpose that we seek to dedicate this day as a holiday, so that the people of this city, whenever the day recurs, may be reminded of Lincoln and all he stands for in American life. It seems to me that in view of the fact that this day is being observed quite generally throughout the country, observed now under legal sanction in 26 States, that here, where he did his great work and earned a fame that is world wide, we should do this much in his honor if distant States deem such act appropriate. I do not see any good reason why the people of this city may not properly ask us, as they have asked us, to give some legal sanction to the observance of Lincoln's birthday. They are not asking for more holidays than States are allowing their employees. The observance of this day will inspire devotion to country, emulation of the highest civic virtues, the advantages of which can not be measured in money.

With these few observations, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has moved the previous question.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Illinois want some time?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Has the time all expired?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] may have his time extended five minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I would like to have a minute.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Make it six minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] may have his time extended six minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois permit one question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota has eight minutes now remaining.

Mr. KITCHIN. One question. Why is it that you limit this holiday to Federal employees in the District? Why not extend it to all the Federal employees?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The other holidays in the District are so limited. Here is the situation, without taking up the time of these gentlemen: In the States Federal employees ought to work if the people in those States work. If, on the other hand, it is a legal holiday in the State, then the legal holiday applies to Federal employees as well.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not understand it so in the case of Federal employees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, intending as I do to vote against this measure, I feel I should say a word in explanation of my vote. Coming as I do from the great State of Illinois, I yield to no one in love and veneration of the great name and fame of Abraham Lincoln. I was taught from childhood to worship Lincoln.

But it seems to me that this measure will add nothing to his honor or to his great fame and place in history. It simply creates another legal holiday in the District of Columbia on which the employees of the Government will receive full pay without performing service to the Government.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think we had better abolish some holidays already existing rather than prevent the enactment of this?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that I would object to that, and certainly not if other holidays are to be created. We now have six legal holidays in the District of Columbia, days on which no one works except Members of the two Houses of Congress. Employees of the Government receive full pay and render no service of any kind on these days. In addition to the six legal holidays, employees of the Government have 30 days leave of absence each year with full pay, and are allowed 30 days sick leave with pay.

This measure adds one more holiday. I am not in favor of doing that, even if the name of the great Lincoln is used in support of the measure.

Making Lincoln's birthday a legal holiday in the District of Columbia and closing all the departments of the Government on that day will not add additional honor or fame to that immortal character. His name and fame fills the whole earth. We can not add to that fame by closing the departments of the Government on his birthday and giving the employees a holiday at an expense of six or seven hundred thousand dollars each year to the taxpayers of the country.

I will support any proposition showing a proper respect to the memory of Lincoln that may be proposed, but believing this does not, I shall vote against its passage.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt here to pronounce a eulogy on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln. Nothing new can be said about this wonderful man and the great service he rendered his country and mankind, but I do desire to say a few words about a matter mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS.

He mentioned the name of Senator Douglas in connection with Lincoln. The names of those two distinguished men are inseparably connected in American history. The great overshadowing fame that came to Lincoln out of the war and his assassination has caused history to fail to do justice to the character, ability, and public service of Stephen A. Douglas. In my opinion Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, next to Abrahm Lincoln, did more to maintain this Union of States than any other one man in America. [Applause.] He and Lincoln had been rivals in the politics of Illinois for a quarter of a century. They had contended as young men in the legislature of our State. They had met and contended in the courts, and in the great contest of 1858, when Douglas made his winning fight for reelection to the Senate, with the administration of President Buchanan against him; and finally in the great contest of 1860, when the cherished ambition of Mr. Douglas, entertained for a lifetime, to become President was forever thwarted. It is well remembered how, on the day of Lincoln's inauguration, with mutterings throughout the great crowd of people here, discontent, threats, rumors of all kinds, when Lincoln stepped forward to deliver his inaugural address Mr. Douglas, his late rival, took his hat and held it in his hand during the delivery of Mr. Lincoln's address.

That was notice to the world that Stephen A. Douglas, the leader of the Democratic Party of the North, who had gone down to defeat in November, intended to stand by the constitutionally elected President of the United States in whatever crisis the future might bring. [Applause.]

Another thing in memory of Douglas. On the day that Fort Sumter was fired upon, when the Associated Press bulletins began to arrive in the city of Washington, Stephen A. Douglas was seen making his way down Pennsylvania Avenue amidst the excited throngs of people. He went to the White House. He had not called upon Mr. Lincoln since his inauguration, more than a month before. He was ushered into the inner room, and for four hours Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas sat in secret conference. They were at that time the two most powerful figures in American public life. What was said between those two men no one knows, as neither of them ever divulged the subject of their conversation.

But for four hours these two distinguished statesmen, lately rivals before the people for the highest office in the gift of the people, were closeted together. When Mr. Douglas left the White House he took a carriage and went to the offices of the Associated Press in the city of Washington and gave out a statement that next morning was published in every metropolitan newspaper of the North in parallel columns with the account of the firing on Fort Sumter, in which he called upon every loyal follower of his to rally to the flag of his country and support the administration in the maintenance of the Union and putting down the rebellion. His call electrified his devoted followers in the North, and within the next few months they enlisted in the Union Army by the thousands. [Applause.] By that service Stephen A. Douglas secured a united North, which otherwise we would not have had. He journeyed from Washington to Springfield and addressed the Illinois Legislature in a powerful speech in favor of the Union. He went from Springfield to Chicago, addressed a great concourse of people there on June 21, went to his hotel, and died that night. He died early in the great struggle for the preservation of the Union, and just at the time when his services were most needed, but he lived long enough to rally the bulk of his followers to the support of the Government.

The powerful influence of Douglas over his followers is illustrated by the southern Illinois district known as Egypt, the territory now represented by my colleague [Mr. DENISON] and myself. In the election in November, 1860, Douglas carried the district over Lincoln by more than 20,000 majority. In a majority of the precincts Lincoln did not receive a single vote, yet when the crisis came the people of this section of Illinois followed Douglas almost to a man, and it has been said this district furnished more men to the Union Army in proportion to population than any other district in the United States.

Such was the transcendent service rendered the American Union by this great Illinois Senator, Stephen A. Douglas. It detracts nothing from the great fame of Lincoln to do full justice to the patriotism, ability, and character of his great antagonist. Without Douglas Lincoln's career would not have been possible. The fact that Lincoln met and overcame this great leader in debate in Illinois in 1858 gave him the nomination and election to the Presidency in 1860. It can be fairly said of Senator Douglas that during this long and brilliant career in public life Abraham Lincoln was the only man ever pitted against him in debate over whom he did not triumph.

There is no instance in American politics more remarkable than the rapid rise of Stephen A. Douglas to fame and power, and his uninterrupted and ever increasing hold on his followers to the close of his career. In the spring of 1833 Douglas, a youth of 20 years, walked into the little village of Winchester, Scott County, Ill. He had left his native State of Vermont and gone West hunting fame and fortune. Carr says that "when he appeared in Winchester he had not a friend within a thousand miles and but a few cents in his pockets," yet within 14 years that friendless boy had been admitted to the bar and had made a great reputation as a lawyer; had served in the Illinois Legislature; had been prosecuting attorney; had been register of the land office at Springfield; had been secretary of state for Illinois; had been a member of the Supreme Court of Illinois; had served two full terms in the National House of Representatives; and had become a Member of the United States Senate, in which body he early assumed the unquestioned leadership of his party, which leadership he retained until his break with the Buchanan administration over the attempt to force slavery on the Territory of Kansas against the will of the people of the Territory. After this Douglas never had a united party behind him, but his influence and power over his followers in the North remained. They followed him to defeat in 1860, and changing almost overnight they followed him in giving support to Lincoln and to the Union after the firing on Fort Sumter.

In speaking of the remarkable unanimity with which the people of the North responded to the call of Mr. Lincoln after the opening of hostilities, Mr. A. E. Pollard, in "The Lost Cause," says:

> What was most remarkable in this display of popular fury was its sudden and complete absorption of the entire Democratic Party of the North, which had so long professed regard for the rights of the Southern States, and even sympathy with the first movements of secession. This party now actually rivaled the abolitionists in their expressions of fury and revenge. They not only followed the tide of public opinion but sought to ride its crest.

This unanimity of sentiment in the North, this grand rally of all classes to the Union cause, was made possible by the bold and patriotic attitude of Stephen A. Douglas. Had he sulked in his tent, had he hesitated or wavered, there would have been such a division of sentiment in the Northern States that Mr. Lincoln's administration would have been helpless to promptly meet the challenge of the revolting States.

The position of unselfish patriotism of Senator Douglas at this time is shown by some of his utterances. In addressing his old friends at Springfield, the scene of so many contests between Mr. Lincoln and himself, he said:

> My friends, you will be false to, and unworthy of, your principles if you allow political defeat to convert you into traitors to your native land.

Again, he characterized secession as—

> The prodigious crime against the freedom of the world, to attempt to blot the United States out of the map of Christendom.

In the same speech he said:

> If war must come, if the bayonet must be used to maintain the Constitution, I say before God my conscience is clear. * * * The shortest way now to peace is the most stupendous and unanimous preparation for war. * * * The slavery question is a mere excuse. The election of Lincoln is a mere pretext. The present secession movement is the result of an enormous conspiracy. * * * But this is no time for the detail of causes. The conspiracy is now known. Armies have been raised, war is levied to accomplish it. There are only two sides to the question. Every man must be for the United States or against it. There are to be no neutrals in this war, only patriots and traitors.
> Thank God, Illinois is not divided on the question. I know they expected to present a united South against a divided North. They hoped that in the Northern States party questions would bring civil war between Democrats and Republicans, when the South would step in with her cohorts, aid one party to conquer the other, and then make easy prey of the victors. Their scheme was carnage and civil war in the North.
> There is only one way to defeat this. In Illinois it is being defeated by closing up the ranks. Illinois has a proud position—united, firm, determined never to permit the Government to be destroyed. I express to you my conviction before God that it is the duty of every American citizen to rally around the flag of his country.

Thus spoke the great Illinois Senator, the ambitious statesman, the great party leader whose personal ambitions to be President were forever destroyed by the triumph of his life-long rival, Abraham Lincoln.

Is it any wonder the North was electrified when this great leader of the defeated party, the idol of millions of his countrymen, came to the support of Mr. Lincoln and the national cause?—

> One blast upon his bugle horn were worth a million men.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am going to support this measure to make the birthday of Abraham Lincoln a holiday in the District of Columbia, not with the idea of doing so in order to give the overworked employees of the District of Columbia a rest. Whatever may be said about their being underpaid, I do not think they are overworked. I favor this measure because 26 States have made the birthday of the great emancipator a national holiday, and this action on the part of the Federal Government to-day is a tardy recognition of a sentiment which is widespread throughout the whole Republic. I would favor the repeal of certain national holidays rather than be opposed to this measure. No character in all the history of this Republic so truly represents what the ideal American character should be as was that of Lincoln. From his birth to his death he tread the wine-press path of sorrow. Probably it was sorrow that purified and strengthened this wonderful man so as to live the life that has made him the ideal by whose standard true Americanism is measured.

When on April 15, 1861, President Lincoln called for troops to put down the rebellion, it was the saddest hour of his melancholy life. He loved his country passionately, and the welfare of its people was his first concern. He was now compelled to give the lives of this people that he loved to save the country they loved. He was a genius, of a unique, unusual, and immense personality, towering above the petty critics and maligners who surrounded him in the hour of the country's greatest peril—always gentle and kind and patient and forgiving. He was often criticized for his long lists of pardons. This sad and patient father could not resist the tearful appeal of a mother for her son, and it brought joy to his heart to see the tearful face before him light with new hope and happiness. He never abused the great power intrusted to him by the people of this Nation except on the side of mercy. Mixed with his melancholy and sadness there was a dry wit and humor in his disposition that saved him in his darkest hours. Vallandigham outwardly was with the North but at heart with the South. He was convicted and sent to Fort Warren prison. Lincoln changed the punishment, and with a grim kind of humor sent him "to his friends in the South."

He said:

Among free men there can be no successful appeal from the ballot to the bullet.

He lived to see his prophesy fulfilled. He lived until victory came. He lived until the Confederate States of America no longer existed, until the doors of Libby and Andersonville prisons were opened. He lived until this great Republic was free, and then, when the herculean task set for him had been completed, he passed from among his millions of idolizing beneficiaries, among whom were his former most bitter enemies, and his name to-day is left with us as a gentle memory.

The Civil War, unlike any other war we have ever engaged in, was a war between two powerful sections of our own country. It was a crisis that showed the true character of men in places of great responsibility. If one was in a place of public trust and confidence and power during these days, it was soon determined as to whether he was a man of ability and of honor and of courage. No public servant was so bitterly maligned, criticized, harassed. No Executive was so unjustly condemned by his enemies from both the North and the South, yet was mortal ever more forgiving, more patient, honest, faithful, and devoted to the good of his country and welfare of its people than the immortal Lincoln? Here, over a half century removed from these events, it seems almost incomprehensible that our forefathers' neighbors could have dealt so unjustly and unkindly with one whose every act and word, whose daily walk in life, should have been the subject of universal praise and encomium. In December, 1860, the following editorial appeared in the Illinois Journal:

We hear such frequent allusions to a supposed purpose on the part of Mr. Lincoln to call into his Cabinet two or three southern gentlemen from the parties opposed to him politically that we are prompted to ask a few questions. First, is it known that a gentleman of character would accept a place in his Cabinet? Second, if yea, on what terms does he surrender to Mr. Lincoln or Mr. Lincoln to him on the political differences between them?

The Chicago Times, on the 1st of July, 1864, in a public editorial, in part, said:

Lincoln can not be fairly and lawfully elected, and the people have determined that he shall not hold office if elected by fraud. He could not be more worthless dead than he is living, but he would be infinitely less mischievous, and his corpse, repulsive as it would be in its freshest state and richest and most graceful habiliments, would yet be the most appropriate sacrifice which the insulted Nation could offer in atonement for its submission to his imbecility and despotism.

It might be well to add that when Gen. Burnside was in command of the department of Ohio he ordered the Chicago Times to be suppressed. Mr. Lincoln with his characteristic "despotism" countermanded the order.

In 1861, at a great public meeting in Springfield, Ill., William Holmes made a speech in which he said:

I feel that I can not be in error when I say that this Union never can be saved by force. Coercion! Force! This is war—war upon the Southern States, not on South Carolina alone. It will be war, then, upon 15 States. Are you prepared for such war? No, gentlemen, thank God, fanaticism has not yet hardened our hearts, and if the Republican leaders expect that it would be a war in the Southern States alone, they will undeceive themselves. I am satisfied that if such a conflict ever comes, it will be war in the North; it will be war in Chicago; war in Springfield; war on the broad prairies of Illinois. Before the patriotic people of this State will allow an invading force to pass beyond its borders, to subjugate the South, they will make one vast mausoleum of your State. (And it is recorded that the audience received the speech with great applause.)

While this speech was being made, the South Carolina Legislature was passing a bill to call out 10,000 troops, and batteries were being erected to bombard Fort Sumter. Senators and Representatives from the Southern States were resigning from Congress. Nowhere did you hear a word of sympathy for the sad man who was soon to take his oath to support the Constitution and the Union. In the House of Representatives of Illinois a member by the name of Green moved to amend the militia bill by providing that the militia be armed with cornstalks. Later, Democratic State platforms all over the North declared the war a failure. The national Democratic platform of 1864, upon which Mr. McClellan was running, had declared that—

After four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war—justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities.

There is no doubt that plans to take the life of Lincoln were made more than once. He was even required to use unusual precautions on his way to the inaugural at Washington, and changed his announced route of travel while on the way. I mention these facts to indicate the political and sectional hatred and hostility that surrounded him as he assumed his tremendous responsibilities.

Lincoln appreciated the magnitude of the task before him if he was to save the Union. He earnestly desired that political strife should be eliminated so far as possible and that the help and support of the best men of the Nation, regardless of the political question, might be given; yet he foresaw that upon the rock of political bias the Union might be lost, so he tendered the command of the Army to a Democrat, Gen. Robert E. Lee, who declined and went with the South. He put McClellan at the head of the Union Army because he believed he was capable and would encourage the loyalty and support of the opposition party. And let it be remembered that McClellan, in one of the bitterest campaigns of the Republic, ran against Lincoln for the Presidency.

Lincoln was a party man—a good Republican on all matters of party principle, but he was too broad and unselfish to let partisanship stand in the way of the success of the great cause for which he seemed to be providentially chosen to champion. It was his party that steadfastly advocated the overwhelming majority view on the issues over which the war was waged. The war was a party issue, and yet he did not regard the war as a Republican war, or as a partisan war. He appointed powerful Democrats to his Cabinet and never regretted having sat at the council table with such a man as Stanton. Stanton was an able man and upheld the hands of Lincoln in the darkest hour of the war. He helped in the effort to unify the remnant of the Democratic Party in the North behind the Union cause. Without such a broad-minded and farseeing policy on the part of Lincoln, the North could not have won the war. Lincoln's appointment of the fourth Democrat to his Cabinet brought out the reply of the President, when reminded of the fact, that he himself was an old line Whig and should be there to make the parties even. He appointed to his first Cabinet each of his three political opponents of the Republican National Convention in Chicago, 1860. He never dreamed of looking up small obscure men for Cabinet positions in order that he might be regarded as a giant among men. Lincoln saw the storm clouds rising and, like the good captain of the vessel that he was, he trimmed the sails of the ship of state to meet the shock. On December 24, 1860, Mr. Lincoln wrote to J. M. Morris as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: Without supposing that you and I are any nearer together politically than heretofore, allow me to tender you my sincere thanks for your Union resolution, expressive of views upon which we never were, and I trust, never will be, at variance.

On June 1, 1861, Mr. Lincoln wrote to William H. Seward as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: Yours of the 8th received. I still hope Mr. Gilmer will, on a fair understanding with us, consent to take a place in the Cabinet. The preference for him over Mr. Hunt or Mr. Gentry is that up to date he has a living position in the South, while they have not. He is only better than Winter Davis in that he is farther South. I fear we could not safely take more than one such man; that is, not more than one more who opposed us in the election, the danger being to lose the confidence of our friends. * * *

Your obedient servant, ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

He was not afraid of Democrats in the Cabinet when the life of the Union was at stake. The one question was with him how many Democrats could he safely take into the Cabinet without stirring up rivalry and jealousy among the Republican members.

Notwithstanding his great number of uncompromising and bitter enemies, Lincoln made friends who stood with him with untiring devotion during the darkest hours of these dark years; by his honesty and his frankness and his unwavering loyalty to what he believed was right, by his constancy, by his consistency, he won the admiration and love and respect of those who learned to know him; and had it not been for these and their unfaltering fidelity to him and his cause, the Stars and Stripes would not now be the most precious symbol of liberty that cheers the hearts of the world.

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly fitting that on the birthday of this matchless character in American history the citizens of this great Republic, saved by the heroism of this great soul, set aside one day out of the 365 in honor of this immortal one's memory; and I shall heartily support the bill for the reasons indicated.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. KITCHIN. One minute. Will the gentleman just permit one question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves the previous question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Can the gentleman move the previous question on the bill before the time is exhausted?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes. This is a House calendar bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but are there not two hours of general debate?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes. This is a House Calendar bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not that what the rule says?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no. The rule provides that when you have a Union Calendar bill under consideration there may be two hours of general debate. This is not a Union Calendar bill. This is a House bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, Mr. DYER demanded a division.

Pending the division,

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum present. Undoubtedly there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and as many as favor passing the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 180, nays 114, not voting 132, as follows:

ACTIONS FOR DEATH ON THE HIGH SEAS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2085) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default occurring on the high seas beyond a marine league from the shore of any State, or the District of Columbia, or the Territories or dependencies of the United States, the personal representative of the decedent may maintain a suit for damages in the district courts of the United States, in admiralty, for the exclusive benefit of the decedent's wife, husband, parent, child, or dependent relative against the vessel, person, or corporation which would have been liable if death had not ensued.

SEC. 2. That the recovery in such suit shall be a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary loss sustained by the persons for whose benefit the suit is brought and shall be apportioned among them by the court in proportion to the loss they may severally have suffered by reason of the death of the person by whose representative the suit is brought.

SEC. 3. That such suit shall be begun within two years from the date of such wrongful act, neglect, or default, unless during that period there has not been reasonable opportunity for securing jurisdiction of the vessel, person, or corporation sought to be charged; but after the expiration of such period of two years the right of action hereby given shall not be deemed to have lapsed until 90 days after a reasonable opportunity to secure jurisdiction has offered.

SEC. 4. That whenever a right of action is granted by the law of any foreign State on account of death by wrongful act, neglect, or fault, occurring upon the high seas, such right may be maintained in an appropriate action in admiralty in the courts of the United States without abatement in respect to the amount for which recovery is authorized, any statute of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 5. That if a person die as the result of such wrongful act, neglect, or default as is mentioned in section 1 during the pendency in a court of admiralty of the United States of a suit to recover damages for personal injuries in respect of such act, neglect, or default, the personal representative of the decedent may be substituted as a party and the suit may proceed as a suit under this act for the recovery of the compensation provided in section 2.

SEC. 6. That in suits under this act the fact that the decedent has been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar recovery, but the court shall take into consideration the degree of negligence attributable to the decedent and reduce the recovery accordingly.

SEC. 7. That the provisions of any State statute giving or regulating rights of action or remedies for death shall not be affected by this act as to causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State. Nor shall this act apply to the Great Lakes or to any waters within the territorial limits of any State, or to any navigable waters in the Panama Canal Zone.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not affect any pending suit, action, or proceeding.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, this legislation is an old friend that has been pending in Congress a great many years. It has been passed from time to time, sometimes in the House and sometimes in the Senate. The bill, if you will examine the report made upon it, is intended to supply a defect which now exists under what was the common-law rule as to actions affecting injuries that might be caused through the wrongful act or neglect of persons engaged in shipping on the high seas. If the injury did not result in death, a cause of action exists; the injured person might go into a court of admiralty and secure relief, but if death resulted courts applied the old common-law doctrine that the cause of action dies with the person; that is, the cause of action was personal and did not survive the injured party.

The object of this bill is to give a cause of action in case of death resulting from negligence or wrongful act occurring on the high seas. Nearly all countries have modified the old rule which did not allow relief in the case of death under such circumstances. Under what is known as Lord Campbell's act, England many years ago authorized recovery in such cases. France, Germany, and other European countries now followed this more humane and enlightened policy and allow dependent parties to recover in case of death of their near relatives upon the high seas.

This bill was introduced in the Senate, has been passed by that body, and is substantially in the form in which it passed this House in the Sixty-fourth Congress. In the Sixty-fifth Congress this same bill, or a very similar one, was reported from the Judiciary Committee, but did not reach consideration on the floor of the House.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Do I understand by the provisions of section 6 that contributory negligence is not to be made a defense?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is not a defense, but will be considered in determining the amount of damages.

Mr. RICKETTS. So that the judge may charge the jury that they may take into consideration contributory negligence in fixing the amount of damages?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Then it would be a defense.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; but it would go in the reduction of the amount of damages. It is a familiar rule in many States that the jury may consider evidence of contributory negligence in determining the amount of damages.

Mr. RICKETTS. It is in mitigation of damages.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; in mitigation of damages, but not as a defense.

Mr. IGOE. Does not the gentleman think that he should inform the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] that this proceeding will be in admiralty and that there will be no jury, so that no Member of the House may have any misunderstanding about it? That question was thrashed out and it was decided best not to incorporate into this bill a jury trial because of the difficulties in admiralty proceedings. I want to ask another question so that it may be clear. It seems to me that on another occasion when this bill was under consideration one of the objections was that it might restrict or take away the right of action which might be permissible under the laws of some States, where, for instance, States border on the Lakes, where death might occur. This bill, as I understand it, has been amended so that it does not cover causes of action arising within the 3-mile limit and excludes from its operations deaths which may occur on the Great Lakes. I think it might be well to explain that to the House.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Section 1 expressly provides that it shall apply to the high seas outside of the 3-mile limit. Section 7 seeks to make certain that any action that originates inside of the 3-mile limit, the Great Lakes, or in the Canal Zone is not to be covered by this act.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What is the meaning of the first sentence in section 7? The statement is that the provisions of any State statute giving or regulating rights of action or remedies for death shall not be affected by this act as to causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State. How is that embraced within the terms of the act, anyway?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The language is general. Maritime jurisdiction extends over the rivers and the lakes, and unless we inserted this provision, section 1 may extend the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States within the States.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It says "occurring on the high seas."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Anything beyond the 3-mile limit is considered as on the high seas. It is provided that anything outside of a league from shore shall be covered by the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. How much is a league?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Three miles.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The terms of the first section of the bill include only causes of action arising from injury——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Neglect or default on the high seas.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Outside of the 3-mile limit?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Then I do not see the necessity for the first sentence of section 7.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Permit me to explain that there are a number of States that have outlying islands with the deep sea intervening more than 3 miles away. For instance, Sitka is a considerable distance from the mainland of Alaska.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is not the justification for section 7 found in the fact that some of the States under the State statutes take jurisdiction of causes of this character where even death may have occurred on the high seas, and that, therefore, you want to preserve that status and not interfere with it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. If the gentleman will excuse me, my understanding is that the object of the act is to make a uniform rule for everything outside of the 3-mile limit.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am speaking of the point made by my friend from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. I understand him to suggest that perhaps section 7 is superfluous because in the first section the legislation is confined to what occurs on the high seas, but the report refers to cases described in this way, taking an illustration from the report:

In another limited liability proceeding arising from a collision more than 3 miles from land between steamships both owned by Delaware corporations the death statute of Delaware was applied.

Is it the purpose to save a situation of that kind by section 7?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon, it does not. It is intended to exclude a situation of that sort, as the chairman states, by making the law uniform. I do not know, but if my memory serves me correctly, this section is put in out of abundant caution, to calm the minds of those who think that rights within the territorial waters will be usurped by the national law. A gentleman once here from an extreme Western State seemed to think, and so contended, that the bill applied to the territorial waters of his State.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. At that time it did.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And this section is intended, by inclusion and exclusion, to put that matter at rest, namely, that the territorial waters of the States shall be retained within the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the States and their courts. I agree with the gentleman that there is no necessity for it except to put at rest the minds of people who see dangers everywhere they turn.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am wondering whether there would be any conflict in jurisdiction—that is, whether you have provided in section 1 for recovery under certain circumstances—then you have carved something out of that in section 7.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. For instance, the territory of the State of Illinois runs out into the middle of Lake Michigan, or close to it, and the territories of Michigan and Illinois join in Lake Michigan. The point where they join is a good deal more than 3 miles from shore. It was not the intent nor the desire in any way to interfere with the jurisdiction of those States over things that happen on the lake, because they happen within the limits of the State, although it is considerably more than 3 miles from the shore. The same thing is true of other bodies of water. If the State gives a remedy, that settles it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The last provision of section 7 covers that part. I am talking about the first sentence.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know. That is a specific provision, but the same situation might arise in other States. Though I do not know, I suppose if a man is injured on the high seas within a State and he can get service on the defendant, as a result of that injury, he can bring suit.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I presume he could.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is a suit in personam.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Could it not reach a vessel in the State of Louisiana that belonged to the Pacific coast. Very evidently it would have to come a good ways around.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the terms of section 7 what would be the effect of the bill as to a vessel, say, in the Mississippi River?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It would be excluded from the operation of this law and be subject to the State laws as they are now.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why would it? The gentleman provides as not to be affected by this act "causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State." The boundary is the middle of the stream, and sometimes it is difficult to locate just exactly where the accident occurred.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Do not the States have concurrent jurisdiction all along the Mississippi River?

Mr. CONNALLY. They have in some cases, but they have not in all. As I understand, they do not have criminal jurisdiction over the whole river.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. At any rate it would be within the boundary of one side or the other.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was speculating as to whether the committee had taken that into consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If I may be indulged just a moment——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I wish to make this suggestion, taking up the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana. The purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is to give exclusive jurisdiction to the admiralty courts where the accident occurs on the high seas.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If that be true, if you give exclusive jurisdiction, there seems to be no necessity for at least a part of section 7, and it therefore appears that in order to remove any doubt as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the admiralty courts, if that is what is desired, that there shall be inserted in section 1 language that will make the exclusive jurisdiction of the admiralty courts clear.

The courts may take the view that as the bill deals with accidents on the high seas and also with accidents within the territorial limits of the States, then even as to causes of action arising on the high seas the admiralty courts and State courts are to have concurrent jurisdiction. If that view is to be avoided, it strikes me that there could be placed easily in the first section of the bill language that would place the point beyond peradventure of a doubt. I have only seen the bill in the last few moments, and am only stating an impression.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I suggest——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In reply to the statement of my colleague [Mr. MOORE] I will say that jurisdiction upon this subject is found in the Constitution of the United States, and it has been held over and over again by our courts that when the Congress legislates in pursuance of constitutional authority such a law is exclusive. It requires no asservation in the bill to make it exclusive. It is exclusive by virtue of its superior jurisdiction; therefore, I submit, it is needless to amend this bill now and raise the chance of its defeat by adding a mere adjective when by the very force of the Constitution and the law in pursuance thereof it is inherently and necessarily exclusive.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. My impression is it would be exclusive upon the theory the gentleman [Mr. MONTAGUE] suggests.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No case occurs to me which would call for the provision in the first part of section 7.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, it does no harm.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, I am not sure about that. Is it necessary that this shall apply only to cases in rem?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In both rem and personam.

Mr. YATES. How could it do any harm?

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it intended that this shall apply to accidents occurring beyond the 3-mile limit?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; but, of course, death might occur, perhaps, inside the limit.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the cause of action has to occur beyond the 3-mile limit?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under that view is not section 7 practically superfluous by reason of the fact that Congress having legislated——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. As to the last part of the section, I do not think it is. There may be a question as to the first four lines, but the persons who drew this are expert admiralty lawyers, and I hesitate very much to attempt to improve on their language.

Mr. CONNALLY. The last few lines of section 7 would not be superfluous as to the Great Lakes, for unless they were excepted they would be included within the terms of the act perhaps.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. And the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. IGOE. Does the gentleman feel that section 7 should be amended? I would say to the gentleman I think to do so would lead to embarrassment, because under the decision in the Hamilton case the statutes of Delaware were held to govern the cause of action where the corporations which owned the vessels were incorporated under the laws of that State even where the ships were upon the high seas. I think it would be well to leave that language so that the action may be permitted under those State laws when the accident occurs within the jurisdiction of the State, but that when the accident or death occurs beyond this limit, then it is governed under this law, because there is no remedy now in all cases.

Mr. CULLEN. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. CULLEN. Then the purpose of that is to make the law uniform? Is that the object of it?

Mr. IGOE. The law is to remain as it is now, where there is a cause of action given by any State law or the decisions of the courts of those States for accidents in waters that are subject to the jurisdiction of those States. And then beyond that the State law does not apply, but this cause of action does apply.

Mr. CULLEN. If the State law applies to-day, then why the necessity for section 7?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The State laws do not always apply. In some States there are no remedies.

Mr. IGOE. The difficulty is that a vessel of one State may collide with the vessel under the jurisdiction of another State, and in that case the court in Massachusetts has held that there was such a conflict and confusion that no remedy could be had.

Mr. CULLEN. I still hold it is superfluous and should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If a case should happen such as the gentleman has mentioned, then the persons having the right of action would have the right to proceed in admiralty under this statute?

Mr. IGOE. Under this statute.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Or they would have the right to proceed in a State court?

Mr. IGOE. If they could have had an action under the State laws it would be excluded under this bill, unless it happened within the territorial limits of the State; that is, within the marine league limit.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If it happens within the marine league limits, then it is not within the terms of the statute at all, because it is not on the high seas.

Mr. IGOE. It is possible to have an action under the State law.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. IGOE. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I am trying to find out is whether it is intended here to give concurrent jurisdiction under section 7 to the State authority and the Federal authority in some cases, and whether it is intended to give exclusive jurisdiction to the Federal authorities in certain cases and to State authorities in certain cases?

Mr. IGOE. This is to give the right of action where there is none now in the Federal court. Of course, where the owners of a vessel submit to the limitation of liability there might be a recovery now, because of having submitted themselves voluntarily to the jurisdiction.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The thing that occurred to me is this: Now, here is a statute providing for an action in admiralty for the decedent. It provides just how the amount recovered shall be distributed and it provides for certain beneficiaries. On the other hand, in section 7, you provide it shall not interfere with the laws of any State. If some State had a law providing for the recovery for wrongful death and entirely different distribution and we enact this statute and say the first statute shall not interfere with the law, you have two rights, first, within the first provisions of this act and then under the State, by the other beneficiaries, and it would subject the person charged to two suits.

Mr. IGOE. It was attempted to provide by this bill that there would not be any conflict between the State and Federal jurisdiction, and it was not intended to have any more concurrent power, as I understand it—at least, not in this bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I did not know but that the gentleman had brought the concurrent power we had in another bill into this bill.

Mr. IGOE. I refer that to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield? I wanted to ask why exception was made as to the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. My understanding is that we have legislation covering the zone. The Panama Canal Zone has a code of laws of its own, and we are trying to leave legislation pertaining to it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as that committee generally deals with that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield for the purpose of offering an amendment——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In order to get it before the House for consideration. I move to strike out, page 3, line 12, after the word "act," the words "as to causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 3, line 12, after the word "act," strike out "as to causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, I do not know whether I am right or wrong about it, because I have not examined the report on this bill carefully as reported this time. But I remember this bill very distinctly in previous Congresses, and my impression, which very likely may be erroneous, is that the purpose of the bill was to confer jurisdiction in certain cases of death where no jurisdiction now exists. I was under the impression that the bill was not intended to take away any jurisdiction which can now be exercised by any State court. I may be wrong about that. I notice in the report in one place, on page 2, this statement from somebody:

We are very anxious to have the bill go through in its present simple form, which avoids conflict with State statutes and yet remedies a crying defect in the maritime law as administered in this country—and so forth.

If the amendment which I have suggested should be agreed to, the bill would not interfere in any way with rights now granted by any State statute, whether the cause of action accrued within the territorial limits of the State or not. In other words, if a man had cause of action and could get service, he could sue in a State court and not be required to bring suit in the Federal court.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. IGOE. In framing the law this difficulty was experienced: It was found that under States, as I said a moment ago, where the corporation was incorporated under the law of a State—the corporation owning the vessel—and an accident occurred upon the high seas, if both vessels were incorporated in the same State, there was no difficulty, but taking a case where——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This does not cover the case of a collision of two vessels and an admiralty suit between the two.

Mr. IGOE. The death may occur on the high seas in collision between vessels.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would not be a suit by one corporation against the other.

Mr. IGOE. The inclination would be to select the corporation that was responsible. In one State the cause of action might be given to one individual, or it might be a different limitation the man has in another State. It was thought that there would be a great deal of confusion growing out of that, and there would be no certainty as to those who might sue or any certainty as to the amount of recovery.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Anybody could bring a suit under this act if he chose to.

Mr. IGOE. Not under your amendment if the State law gave a cause of action and a death occurred on the high seas.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Where there is a provision to that effect there would be concurrent jurisdiction.

Mr. IGOE. No. If we pass a law for admiralty jurisdiction in the United States, it is exclusive in certain cases.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If it is exclusive, then it does not affect this.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman is excluding an entire class of cases.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We give a certain class of rights under this act. If this act as originally drawn by the admiralty lawyers was intended for the purpose of taking away jurisdiction now conferred by State statutes, it ought to be very critically examined.

Mr. IGOE. That is why the Great Lakes were excepted, where there could not be a conflict at all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is just as easy to have a conflict on the Great Lakes as it is on the high seas, so far as that is concerned. The whole argument made in favor of this bill, as I recollect it, was that under the common law if a man received an injury through the negligence of another he could bring a suit. If he died the suit ended. If he was killed by the injury he had no right of action. The whole purpose of this was to conform to modern ideas of humanity and give a right of action where death was the result of the negligence of another. Now, if we are told that where that right of action now exists under State statutes that suit can be brought in State courts, we propose to pass an act to take away that right, I do not see how we are progressing.

Mr. IGOE. In the State of Massachusetts that right has been taken away. They would not apply the laws of the States, because the laws conflict.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They would not be required to comply with the laws of a State. The gentleman's proposition would take away the right of the State to apply its own laws.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. From the gentleman's recollection in regard to the discussion of this matter heretofore, was it the intent of the legislators to give exclusive jurisdiction to the admiralty courts of the United States in regard to accidents on the high seas?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I would not undertake to say. That is my recollection of it. Still, that may be the intent of the men who drew the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. VOLSTEAD] adhere to that?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This bill has not always been in the same form. Originally it was intended to exclude State jurisdiction where the cause of action arose inside of the 3-mile limit. I am not sure but that the bill, at some time or another, when it passed the House, did contain a provision giving concurrent jurisdiction. This bill clearly leaves the jurisdiction exclusive in the Federal court outside of the 3-mile limit.

Mr. DEWALT. In order to remove any doubt as to that, does not the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary believe it would be wise, in section 1, to state that the admiralty courts of the United States do have exclusive jurisdiction in such cases? That would clear that down.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The view taken by the parties who drew this bill is that it is exclusive, because, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] pointed out, the power to pass laws on this subject is conferred on Congress in the Constitution, and whenever Congress acts I have no doubt it excludes the power on the part of the State to pass laws on the same subject.

Mr. DEWALT. If that is true, as to that sort of accidents resulting in death, and if there be no doubt about that, according to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], and the gentleman's interpretation, and it being exclusive only as to matters occurring on the high seas, and also that the States have jurisdiction in regard to matters happening in their territorial limits, what is the use in having section 7?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Section 7 has a use, at least, as far as the Great Lakes and the Panama Canal are concerned.

Mr. DEWALT. According to your contention, there is no use in having section 7.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may we have that amendment reported again?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, after the word "act," strike out "as to causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I know but very little about this question. I wanted to direct an inquiry to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if I may.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GARRETT. It reads, "That the provisions of any State statute giving or regulating rights of action or remedies for death shall not be affected by this act."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the way it will be left, so that the act will not take away any jurisdiction conferred now by the States.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. It was alluded to once that the proceedings under this act would never have recourse to a jury. Is that true?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so. Perhaps, for certain purposes, under the practice that prevails, they may have a jury, but ordinarily a jury is not allowed. However, I do not know much about admiralty practice.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. But under this concurrent jurisdiction to which my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] refers, that would be a proceeding in which there would be a jury trial, and the action might hinge upon the fact that the parties wanted to have a jury trial or not have a jury trial.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have no doubt but that under section 7, in the causes of action originating within the boundaries of a State, under State laws, a jury would be permitted, because it would be a cause of action in tort, and, of course, a jury trial would be permitted there.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to know what the effect of this law would be if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be adopted with reference to this particular question: As thus amended, the first sentence in section 7 will read, "That the provisions of any State statute giving or regulating rights of action or remedies for death shall not be affected by this act." Now, as I understand it, if a person living in Illinois should be in the beneficiary class, should be, say, the widow of a person who had been killed on the high seas, that person may now bring action in personam in the State court of Illinois, and the damages recovered shall then be distributed in accordance with the provisions of the State statutes. Now, if this act is passed as thus amended, it will give that widow the right to elect as to whether she shall proceed under the terms of the act conferring jurisdiction upon the Federal courts with reference to this matter, or whether she shall proceed under the State statute of Illinois. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is my view of it, and my understanding is that in the form in which the bill at one time was drawn there was a provision something like this, and there was a precautionary clause added to prevent a double action; that is, to prevent action first in the State court and then afterwards an action in the Federal court.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The reason I raised the question is that you notice here that the action is for the benefit of the husband, parent, or child. My recollection of the action for wrongful death in Illinois is that the child precedes the parent in the beneficial interest. It seems to me this might give conflicting rights. If the right of action were in one person in either case, then, of course, having elected to proceed under one provision, he would be barred from proceeding under the other provision. But suppose that the parent had the right to proceed in admiralty in the Federal courts under this law, and suppose under the State law of Illinois the child had the right to proceed. Now, how are you going to have an election in that case when the right to elect is not in the same person?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It would be a good deal simpler if we should leave the statute in the form in which it is drawn.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would be a good deal wickeder.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, it might or might not be. That might depend upon circumstances. In some cases there would be some advantage in having the two.

I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves the previous question on the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; I will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; I withdraw it for the time being.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer an amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEWALT: Page 1, line 12, after the word "ensued," insert "And in such cases the district court of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I submit that my amendment must be voted upon before that.

Mr. DEWALT. I was waiting for the vote on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think we have discussed this sufficiently, and I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That will cut out the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DEWALT. I desire to be heard just a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. DEWALT. I recognize that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course, the point of order is sustained, and the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not now in order. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] moves the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I withdraw that for the time being.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from West Virginia rise?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making some comments on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, if this bill becomes law the jurisdiction of the admiralty and the State courts will not be concurrent. The admiralty court will have jurisdiction of the action if the cause of action arose on the high seas or on other navigable waters, and it is not within the power of Congress to further extend such jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the States, as a matter of course, can not be taken away from them by congressional action. The constitutional clause upon which we predicate this measure gives Congress the power to prescribe a remedy for wrongful death occurring at sea. This power extends "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction."

The object of section 7 of the bill is to manifest a recognition of the jurisdiction of the States as to matters that the State legislatures have the right to deal with. If you were to adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and eliminate the latter part of the first clause in the seventh section, which reads thus:

As to causes of action accruing within the territorial limits of any State—

you would defeat the very object which the gentlemen desire to accomplish, namely, the preservation of the authority of the States. The effect of the amendment would be to leave the sentence incomplete and the remaining language, not unlike Mahomet's coffin, suspended between heaven and earth, having no application to anything in particular. Even if you treat this phrase as surplusage, it can do no harm, for the reason that that which is useless does not vitiate the useful. If we follow the line of decisions, beginning with Gibbons against Ogden, and coming on down, we will find that the Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction whenever Congress exercises a power that may have hitherto remained dormant, and therefore it may be that the class of decisions in State courts, as in Delaware, would fall, except for the provision which was wisely inserted by experienced lawyers, who thrashed the matter out; and I have no doubt but that every word in that paragraph has a very particular and precise bearing and was designed to take care of an important legal situation.

If the amendment prevails, my judgment is that the State courts and their decisions will be superseded by the exclusive power and authority of the admiralty courts, and such result will be in harmony with the decisions of the Supreme Court in interpreting the commerce clause of the Constitution. I would like to see the bill pass in its present form. If it had been the law at the time the Titanic went down, the families of those who found a grave in the chilly waters of the great deep would not have gone out of court empty handed.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will have to get time yielded by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many of the gentlemen here are admiralty lawyers. I must say I am not, but it strikes me that there may be considerable danger in this bill, especially with reference to the matter of jurisdiction upon the Great Lakes. Now, my recollection is that in the State of New York, when a death occurs upon Lake Erie, we go into the admiralty court and plead the cause of action for death or the right to recover for death under the State statute. If this bill is passed it leaves it very uncertain whether we can go into the admiralty court. I notice that this bill, or a similar bill, has been considered by the House before, and the opinion of Judge Putnam is attached. He says, with reference to this bill, that section 1 gives a right of action in the admiralty court for death from negligent acts occurring upon the high seas, the Great Lakes, and other navigable waters.

Now, this bill strikes out the Great Lakes. I am very uncertain as to what situation we will find ourselves in with reference to death occurring on the Great Lakes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You will be in exactly the same position that you are now.

Mr. IGOE. That is the anxiety of many men—that the bill is interfering with present remedies for death on the Great Lakes and that the law is now sufficient.

Mr. MACGREGOR. You have this law applying to death in one case and a different law applying to death in another case.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would the gentleman deny the right of the people to the benefit which this law confers in cases where there is now no remedy? Does not the gentleman think it is an opprobrium of our Government and of our civilization that people dying from injuries sustained upon the high seas have no remedy whatever?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I always thought that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why, then, if this bill does not interfere with inland waters, should such noninterference be invoked to kill this bill?

Mr. MACGREGOR. My only point was whether it might cause such a confusion that we would not know exactly how we were situated in regard to death on the Great Lakes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill does not apply to the Great Lakes at all; it does not affect any existing laws applicable to them.

Mr. MACGREGOR. But you would have one law applying to death on the Great Lakes and another applying to death on the high seas.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Great Lakes are not the high seas.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I admit that the gentleman knows more about this than I do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This bill has been killed three or four times in other Congresses on three grounds: One, that it embraced the Great Lakes and inland waters; the second, that it did not provide for a jury trial; third, that there was no limitation upon the liability of shipowners, and that there ought to be such a limitation. These three objections, in some form or another, have been interjected heretofore to kill this very meritorious legislation. This bill as now worked out is not perfect, and no legislation is perfect, but certainly in the minds of the committee it is legislation that we would generally consider most wholesome and righteous for mankind. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN of Illinois) there were—10 ayes and 12 noes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have somebody here to decide such an important proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of no quorum?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 201, nays 75, answered "present" 1, not voting 149, as follows:

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question to the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CODE.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6025) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the bill H. R. 6025, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be enacted, etc., That the act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, constituting the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, be, and the same are hereby, amended as follows:

By striking out section 20 and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 20. Forcible entry and detainer: Whenever any person shall forcibly enter and detain any real property, or shall unlawfully, but without force, enter and unlawfully and forcibly detain the same; or whenever any tenant shall unlawfully detain possession of the property leased to him, after his tenancy therein has expired; or any mortgagor or grantor in a mortgage or deed of trust to secure a debt shall unlawfully detain the possession of the real property conveyed, after a sale thereof under such deed of trust or a foreclosure of the mortgage, or any person claiming under such mortgage or grantor, after the date of the mortgage or deed of trust, shall so detain the same; or a judgment debtor or any person claiming under him, since the date of the judgment, shall so detain possession of real property, after a sale thereof under an execution issued on such judgment, it shall be lawful for the municipal court, on complaint under oath, verified by the person aggrieved by said unlawful detention or by his agent or attorney, having knowledge of the facts, to issue a summons to the party complained of to appear and show cause why judgment should not be given against him for the restitution of the possession."

By striking out section 35 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 35. In case the property shall appear to belong to the claimant or to be exempt from such process, judgment shall be entered against the plaintiff for costs, and the property levied upon shall be released. If the property shall not appear to belong to the claimant or to be exempt, as aforesaid, judgment shall be entered against said claimant or the defendant, as the case may be, for costs, including additional costs occasioned by the delay in the execution of the writ. An appeal may be taken from the judgment as in other cases."

By striking out section 65 and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 65. The general term of said court shall be open at all times for the transaction of business; and said court, by orders passed in general term, may regulate the periods of holding the special terms, fix the number of said terms, and alter the same from time to time, as public convenience may require; may direct as many terms of any of the special terms to be held at the same time as the public business may make necessary; may assign the several justices from time to time to the respective special terms; may establish written rules regulating pleading, practice, and procedure, and by said rules make such modifications in the forms of pleading and methods of practice and procedure prescribed by existing law as may be deemed necessary or desirable to render more simple, effective, inexpensive, and expeditious the remedy in all suits, actions, and proceedings, provided that said rules be posted or publishd not less than 30 days prior to the date when they are to become effective; may appoint a clerk, an auditor, and also a crier and a messenger for each court in special term, and all other officers of the court necessary for the due administration of justice, with the exception of all officers and employees in any manner connected with the probate term, and also United States commissioners; may hear charges of misconduct against any judge of the municipal court and remove him from office for cause shown; may admit persons to the bar of said court and censure, suspend, or expel them; and may pass all other orders not inconsistent with existing laws which may be necessary to the effective administration of justice in said court, but said court shall not hear any cause in general term: Provided, That the general term may assign more than one justice to a special term for the trial of a given case."

By striking out section 67 and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 67. By mutual consent and arrangement between justices, causes may be certified by any justice holding a special term to any justice holding any other special term of said court for trial in the latter: Provided, That a criminal case can only be certified for trial from one criminal court to another criminal court. In the absence of any justice assigned to a special term, such special term may be presided over and its business conducted by any other justice."

By adding a new paragraph at the end of section 105 to read as follows:

"Personal service of process may be made by any person not a party to or otherwise interested in the subject matter in controversy on a nonresident defendant out of the District of Columbia, which service shall have the same effect and no other as an order of publication duly executed. In such case the return must be made under oath in the District of Columbia, unless the person making the service be a sheriff or deputy sheriff, a marshal or deputy marshal, authorized to serve process where service is made, and such return must show the time and place of such service and that the defendant so served is a nonresident of the District of Columbia. The cost and expense of such service of process out of the District of Columbia shall be borne by the party at whose instance the same is made and shall not be taxed as a part of the costs in the case; but where such service of process is made by some authorized officer of the law in this section mentioned, the actual and usual cost of such service of process shall be taxed as a part of the costs in the case.

By striking out section 115a, and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 115a. Lunacy proceedings: All writs de lunatico inquirendo shall issue from said equity court, and a justice holding said court shall preside at all inquisitions of lunacy, and may impanel a jury from among the petit jurors in attendance in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia."

By inserting immediately after section 123 a new section as follows:

"SEC. 123a. Continuing decedent's business: The said court may, in its discretion, authorize any fiduciary, accountable to it, to continue the business of a decedent for a period not exceeding 12 months after decedent's death. No order shall be entered so authorizing a fiduciary until he shall have filed a petition under oath, supported by the affidavits of two reputable persons familiar with the decedent's business, setting

SEC. 2. That this act shall not take effect until the expiration of 30 days from its approval, and shall not affect the term of service of jurors who are already drawn and in attendance, or who may, within said period of 30 days, be drawn and accepted for service in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the police court of the District of Columbia, or the juvenile court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, this bill embodies a number of proposed amendments to the Code of the District of Columbia. It has been pending in some form or another in the Committee on the Judiciary for, I think, four or more years. In the Sixty-fifth Congress this matter was submitted to us and a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I happen to be a member, went over these amendments very carefully, thrashed out the various propositions, and agreed on a bill. That was submitted to the judges of the supreme court and to a committee of the bar association of the District. It was very carefully considered from all angles by the judges and the bar association and they are very strongly in favor of this bill. It has been exceedingly difficult to secure the necessary amendments to the District Code. A great deal of the work we are doing here is of such a nature that we can seldom give the proper attention to District legislation, and it was thought that by putting all of these amendments into one bill they might be considered and passed as one act rather than to attempt to bring in all these various propositions and pass them as separate bills, a thing that would be practically impossible.

I feel that we ought to give to this District the relief that they have asked for in this matter. It is legislation in which I think the membership generally is not very largely interested. It seems to me that we may properly defer to the judgment of the bench and bar of this District; they thoroughly understand the needs of the District. I can think of no class of people who would understand that need any better than the judges who for years have administered the law or the lawyers who have constantly tried cases here.

I shall not attempt to go into detail. I had the bill read so that the membership might have a general idea of what is sought. To attempt to explain each item would be almost endless. I feel that in view of the situation we ought to be able to pass this without very many changes, and if there are any amendments that are to be proposed the bill is now open to amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The bill is not open to amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I understand that it is not open to amendments, as a matter of course.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman in regard to the preparation of this bill? Were the judges of whom he speaks brought before a subcommittee, and did the subcommittee go over this bill section by section with the judges?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In the Sixty-fifth Congress we went over the bill section by section, and a subcommittee very carefully considered each item in the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Especially each amendment that was proposed?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The subcommittee themselves went over these various items with these men representing the District?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. First we had a hearing, at which the judges appeared, as did also members of the bar. Then a subcommittee was appointed, and we went over each item in the bill. We made a number of changes, and then it was resubmitted to the bar association of the District and to the judges, and they approved whatever changes were made, and under those circumstances it comes to us here.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to inquire with reference to section 1535–b, at the bottom of page 41.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if he desires to know the changes that are made he can get a copy of the report and determine it from that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I know what the changes are. This is a new section, section 1535–b. It is provided in this section that in any case where it shall appear that an action at law should have been brought in equity, or a suit in equity should be brought at law, the judge presiding may transfer the case.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am in entire sympathy with the object sought to be accomplished. The thing that occurred to me is at what stage of the proceedings that transfer shall be made.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. As soon as the pleadings are filed.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And all the time up until final judgment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I think not. When the pleadings are filed, that would naturally determine the character of the action.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whenever the court should determine. If the court should determine, if it be brought in equity, that it should have been brought in law, he would have the power to transfer it at any time.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is a provision to this effect:

All testimony taken before such transfer, if preserved, shall stand as testimony in the case.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I suppose that naturally would refer more particularly to depositions. Ordinarily when an action is brought on for trial the court would determine whether it is a case in equity or a case at law. It might perhaps develop on the trial itself—that is, through the evidence—but the pleadings ought to disclose the character of the action.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That sentence is not perfect, but I was not thinking of that. The thing I really wanted to know is whether the committee intended in this law to permit a transfer after they go into the trial of a supposedly law case before a jury, the equity side, and try the cause with a judge by merely letting him read the evidence, or if it is the purpose that the word "testimony" means depositions and affidavits, and I was wondering, if the latter be true, why more appropriate language was not used.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let me make this suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana. In my State we have common-law practice and equity practice. That exists in very few States outside of the Federal courts, and it frequently develops when we come to the very end of a case the claim is made in a common-law case that it should have been an equity proceeding. In our State, unless it has been recently changed, and we shall have a decision of the court that means a dismissal of the case entirely, or a case may be brought in equity which should have been brought at common law, and that ends the case. The testimony may all have been taken, the case may be ready for final decree or entry of final judgment. I take it the purpose of this practically is to permit in that case the court to determine upon the evidence that is in, unless the parties desire to offer additional evidence. I think the language of the bill here, where it says "all testimony taken before such transfer is preserved," should be "which is preserved," "shall stand as testimony in the cause."

Mr. DEWALT. Does not the gentleman think it should be "if preserved"?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the same thing.

Mr. DEWALT. All testimony taken before such transfer, "if preserved"?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very likely, "which is preserved" amounts to the same thing; "if preserved" would be better than the other.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is not an uncommon provision, because in a number of States they have a provision of this kind. I know of some States where they have a provision of this kind, but I do not mean to say it is just in this language.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In those States usually they do not have common law and equity practice distinct. They have a provision so as to save the case in the court without commencing a new cause of action or being cut off by the statute of limitations.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was going to raise that point. Suppose a man commences an action at law and proceeded and the statute of limitations had run pending the suit and then he wanted to have his case changed and, say, for instance, have an instrument reformed and it is found that it should more properly be tried in an equity court, he is permitted here to amend it and go into an equity court. Now, would the statute commence at the time of the filing of the original action?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Or commence at the time of the transfer?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It commences at the time of the filing of the original action.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Bringing the action would save the statute of limitations.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If he had the same cause of action.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, the practice indicated by the gentleman has prevailed in my State for some years. The purpose is plainly to prevent the ending of an action for want of jurisdiction of a cause; that is, equity might not have jurisdiction and law might not have jurisdiction. But so far as they have gone, the question of jurisdiction being raised or decided, it can then be transferred to the proper forum which has jurisdiction, and action will not be ended and will still run from the time it is first instituted and the rights of the parties will be preserved, and the testimony taken will be considered as testimony in the cause wherever it may be transferred.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Suppose it is an equity case and three-fourths of the case has been heard. How is that testimony gotten to the jury when it is transferred to the law side?

Mr. STEELE. It can be read to the jury, and if the witness is living he may be called and if he is dead his testimony can be then read. It simply preserves the rights of all the parties.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And it is very desirable.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think it is; but the question in my mind was whether it went into sufficient detail as to the statute of limitations, continuances, and other matters of similar nature.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think that language ought to be changed where it says "is preserved" and make it "if preserved." Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, page 42, line 6, that the word "is" be stricken out and the word "if" be inserted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify the language on page 42, line 6, by striking out the word "is" and inserting the word "if." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, on line 19, page 4, I ask unanimous consent that the word "censored" be changed to "censured."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to modify the language, page 4, line 19, by striking out the word "censored" and inserting the word "censured."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no such word there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It should be page 19, line 4.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to striking out, line 4, page 19, the word "censored" and inserting the word "censured"? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is the bill read for amendment at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to ask the chairman about this matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. If you are going to change this code, there ought to be something done with it to safeguard against abuse. They have been appointing guardians here for soldiers in St. Elizabeths Hospital without consulting the parents or giving any notice to the people interested, who live far out into the interior, of the appointment of fiduciaries here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think I ought to consent to an amendment of that kind, because that is a matter that ought to receive very careful consideration.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to call the chairman's attention to this fact, that they have appointed them without consent, and they go out here and collect this allowance made by the Government, and I think the Congress of the United States ought to protect these soldiers from the payment of any fees that ought not to be paid here.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman will introduce a bill on the subject and it comes to our committee, I will be glad to call the committee's attention to the matter.

Mr. McKEOWN. There is a section on the subject of lunacy in this code, and I have an amendment to propose which reads as follows:

No fiduciary shall be appointed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or by any justice thereof for any soldier, sailor, or marine confined in any hospital in the District of Columbia without the written consent of the nearest of kin of such soldier, sailor, or marine.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What would the gentleman do about the matter of real estate, where you have to serve people and they would not give their consent?

Mr. McKEOWN. In that case——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would you hold up all the proceedings?

Mr. McKEOWN. The case should refer to nonresident soldiers who are brought into the District and put in these hospitals.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand; but suppose you have a case involving property where the innocent person is a party defendant, you can proceed without having a guardian appointed. But if the appointment of the guardian depended upon somebody's consent, and they do not give the consent, do you mean to say you never could go ahead with the case?

Mr. McKEOWN. I would not want that at all.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman allow an explanation?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. I think I can point to a concrete instance to show the gentleman that an amendment of the character he has mentioned is not necessary. There is now in the Walter Reed Hospital one Francis J. Kennally, who by reason of shell shock and injury in the war became insane. He has what is known as a total disability, and therefore is entitled to $100 per month, plus $57.50 by reason of his insurance. Of course, the man is incompetent to receive the money himself, as he is insane. The Walter Reed Hospital authorities have him in charge, and, of course, will not discharge him, because he has this total disability. In order to get the $157.50 to be administered for his benefit, he, the said Francis J. Kennally, living in Lehigh County, Pa., gave notice to his relatives of these facts, and they applied there for the appointment of a guardian. They applied at his place of residence, and under the statutes of Pennsylvania a guardian was appointed, notification given to the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and upon proper authentication of the appointment of guardian the money is being paid over to the guardian.

Mr. McKEOWN. I was going to say I had in mind a particular case that came to my attention of a soldier who was out here at St. Elizabeths Hospital from my district. A fiduciary was appointed here in the District of Columbia, without any notice at all to the soldier's parents, who live in Oklahoma, and, as a result, while they are not blaming the fiduciary, because he kept accurate account, yet there was an expense which accumulated that they considered large, and that would not have occurred had the parents had any notice so that the guardianship proceedings could have been had in Oklahoma under our statutes, where they would have had jurisdiction.

Mr. DEWALT. I think the gentleman's question would be better met by slight amendment to the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. McKEOWN. I had no desire to impede this legislation. I wanted to call it to the attention of the committee so that like things would not occur in the future here in the District of Columbia, because I think the parents of these boys that are unfortunate will expect us to protect them.

And while I am on my feet there is one other question I wanted to ask. I notice in the qualification of jury commissioners for the District of Columbia there is an absence of the usual provision in those qualifications, and that is that they be not interested in any suit pending in the courts of the District of Columbia. I should think it would not be right to appoint jury commissioners to select jurors without some provision that they were not interested in any litigation and were free of any litigation in the courts or the District. There is an absence of any such provision in the qualifications of the jury commissioners.

Mr. CARAWAY. On what page is that?

Mr. McKEOWN. That is on page 9, line 24. I had an amendment to suggest there, that after the word "law," strike out the period and insert "nor be a party to any cause then pending in the courts of the District of Columbia."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. On what page?

Mr. McKEOWN. On page 9, line 24. After the word "law," strike out the period and insert "nor be a party to any cause then pending in the courts of the District of Columbia."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is probably too broad for an equity case. If it was a jury cause, perhaps it would be all right.

Mr. McKEOWN. Then pending in the courts of law. I can not see why the amendment should not be in there, because that is the usual qualification for jury commissioners in most of our States.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be inserted in the bill, on page 9.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the language be inserted on page 9, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 9, line 24, after the word "law," strike out the period and insert "nor be a party to any cause then pending in the courts of the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MacCRATE. Reserving the right to object, may I ask if the language necessitates the resignation of the commissioner if he is sued?

Mr. McKEOWN. This refers to the time he is appointed.

Mr. MacCRATE. That might be considered to mean at the time the suit was instituted against him he would be disqualified for the service, unless you would limit it in some way.

Mr. McKEOWN. I think it refers to the time he is appointed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MacCRATE. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman amend that so that it would not be after his appointment.

Mr. McKEOWN. The amendment says "then pending at the time of his appointment."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That does not relate to the time of the appointment, I think. The jury commission shall be composed of three commissioners, and the bill provides that they shall have been domiciled in the District for three years prior to their appointment, and that they shall be freeholders in the District of Columbia, and not engaged in the practice of law. I do not think one of these three commissioners, after he is appointed, could engage in the practice of law. You could easily make that amendment read, "at the time of his appointment."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be so modified.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let us have the amendment reported again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the period and insert "nor at the time of their appointment be a party to any cause then pending in the courts of the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. I will remind the House that the House meets at 11 o'clock to-morrow, under the rule.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BEE, for to-day, on account of important business.

ABSENCE OF A QUORUM.

Mr. FESS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is evident that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 18, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

H. R. 12724. An act to declare Lincoln's birthday a legal holiday was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Does the Senator wish to present some personal matter?

Mr. SMOOT. Just for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on March 10 the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] had placed in the RECORD an editorial prepared by Mr. V. S. McClatchy—an editorial expression of the Sacramento Bee—on the subject of trans-Pacific news service. A few days before the Senator from California asked that it be printed in the RECORD, and I objected. Yesterday I was attending a meeting of the Appropriations Committee and while there Mr. PHELAN, Senator from California, requested that the article be printed in the RECORD in the following statement:

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, some time ago there was inserted in the RECORD some matter which was more defamatory than critical of the public services of Herbert Hoover. A prominent journalist of Georgia wrote me on the subject and asked me to ascertain what Mr. Hoover had to say concerning this and other matters, principally relating to cotton seed. In answer to a letter from me he wrote me this reply, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The article was without objection ordered printed in the RECORD.

A controversy, Mr. President, between Mr. Hoover and certain public men was brought before the Senate by request of certain Senators that articles be printed in the RECORD, and I do not know how many pages of the RECORD have been taken up with such articles. We find in the RECORD of yesterday two or three pages of letters from Mr. Hoover and others in relation to the controversy. I think this practice ought to stop, and——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah is familiar, I think, with the way this matter arose. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] placed in the RECORD an editorial——

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. First, there is no order in the Chamber, and, secondly, out of whose time does this debate come?

Mr. SMOOT. If it is necessary, it can be taken out of my time.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not mean that in any offensive way. That is not offensive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Arizona state his point of order?

Mr. ASHURST. First, that there is no order in the Chamber, and, secondly, I wish to propound the question, Out of whose time does this debate come? I hope the Senator from Utah will not be offended.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not offended.

Mr. ASHURST. I meant no offense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona demand the regular order?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not. I simply want to know out of whose time this debate comes.

Mr. KENYON. We are not talking on a reservation. I understand the Senator from Utah has brought up the question as to unanimous consent to have matter printed in the RECORD. An editorial from Wallace's Farmer was placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] took the matter up, apparently, with Mr. Hoover, and a few days afterwards placed in the RECORD a number of documents from Mr. Hoover. I have held an editorial from Wallace's Farmer for some days and a letter to Senator GORE in answer to the statement Mr. Hoover had placed in the RECORD through the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON]. I have believed that the Senator from Utah was right in keeping these matters out of the RECORD. It is not an institution to boost Mr. Hoover or anybody else for the Presidency.

But now that this controversy has been started, and Mr. Wallace has been attacked by Mr. Hoover, and that has become a part of the RECORD of the Senate, I feel that Mr. Wallace's reply, his letter to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and his editorial as to Mr. Hoover's statement, ought to be placed in the RECORD also. Since this other matter has gone into the RECORD, and I think the Senator from Utah has been right in trying to keep such matters out of the RECORD, I am going to ask, and the Senator from Utah can object to it if he desires, that the reply of Mr. Wallace, one of the best writers in this country on agricultural subjects and one of the clearest-headed and best men in the Middle West, who has been attacked in this way, shall go into the RECORD, and that the editorial in Wallace's Farmer with reference to Mr. Hoover shall go into the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator if he will not allow his request to go in the regular way to the Committee on Printing, and then let the committee take into consideration the question of printing it, and decide as to whether it ought to be done or not. I think it ought to be, in answer to what has already been put into the RECORD. I am going to ask——

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I agree to that, but I do not propose that Mr. Wallace shall be attacked on the floor of the Senate by Mr. Hoover or any of the sponsors for Mr. Hoover in his candidacy for the Presidency, on whatever ticket he may be running, without a chance to have a reply put into the RECORD, if I have to read it myself.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. KENYON. In this editorial by Mr. Wallace I think will be found some very interesting statements as to some of the influences behind Mr. Hoover for the Presidency. According to the Wallace article our friends the packers seem to be quite content with Mr. Hoover's candidacy.

Mr. SMOOT. If it goes to the Committee on Printing——

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I ask that the request for printing the editorial and the letter of Mr. Wallace be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Just one moment, and I am through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say just one word.

Mr. REED. I hope I shall not have this charged up against my time.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. Mr. President, I want to say once again that it is impossible for me to be in the Chamber all the time, but I hope when a request like the one which was made yesterday is presented some Senator will object to its going into the RECORD.

RESTORATION OF AMERICAN LIBERTY.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I take this occasion to announce that on Monday next, at the close of morning business, if it meets with the convenience of the Senate, I shall address the Senate on the subject of the restoration of American liberty.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following as a reservation and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the reservation proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions affect its national honor or its vital interests and declares that such questions are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations or any agency thereof or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

Mr. REED. I offer the following reservation:

14. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions affect its honor or its vital interests and declares that such questions are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations or any agency thereof or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

Mr. President, this is the exact reservation that was submitted by the Foreign Relations Committee when we had the treaty before us the first time. It then lacked only a few votes of passage. It had full consideration by the Foreign Relations Committee. The reservation declares the same principle that is found in almost every general treaty we have heretofore entered into. It was written into The Hague convention, as I recall, by Mr. Root. It is not in the Bryan treaties—I answer that objection now, for it was made before—because the Bryan treaties did not provide for anything except arbitration. Moreover, the Bryan treaties contained this clause:

The high contracting parties reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter of the dispute after the report of the commission shall have been submitted.

That provision left the United States perfectly free to act as its interests demanded, regardless of any decision rendered. But the pending treaty does not leave us free to act. A decision is absolutely binding. The sole question therefore is whether the United States will submit to a foreign tribunal questions that affect its life and its honor.

Now, let us plainly understand what that tribunal is to be. When the United States has a controversy with another nation the question goes for decision to the council of the League of Nations and the United States, being a party to the controversy, does not sit and does not vote. Our antagonist does not sit and does not vote. That leaves upon the council seven men, every one of whom is an alien; every one of whom is the representative of a foreign government. That government or that individual may be at enmity with the United States; may be directly interested in the controversy, but not a party of record thereto. The decision may involve the very life of the United States. It may be a decision adverse to the United States, for the right of decision carries with it the right to decide against us as well as in our favor. That is true, as a matter of course.

I put it to Senators whether we ought not to reserve to ourselves the right not to submit any question that involves the life of the Republic; not to submit any question that, in our judgment, involves the high honor of the Republic. All that the reservation does is to reserve to this Government the right to say that when it considers a question vital to it, when it believes a question involves the very life of the Republic or the high honor of the Republic, we will decide that for ourselves.

Mr. President, a vote against this reservation is a vote to submit the honor and the life of the United States to a tribunal sitting in Europe, composed exclusively of aliens. I have stated the case; I shall not go into the precedents; but I shall ask the liberty of printing as a part of my remarks clauses from the other treaties heretofore entered into in which this same reservation, in substance, appears.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clauses of the treaties referred to in general are:

TREATIES WHERE QUESTIONS AFFECTING NATIONAL HONOR AND VITAL INTEREST WERE EXCLUDED FROM ARBITRATION.

The following clause was written into The Hague peace conference of 1899. It appears as Title III, article 9, on page 27, of "Text of the peace conferences at The Hague, 1899 and 1907," by James Brown Scott. William McKinley was President and John Hay was Secretary of State when convention was held.

"Indifferences of an international nature involving neither honor nor vital interest, and arising from a difference of opinion on points of fact, the signatory powers recommend that the parties who have not been able to come to an agreement by means of diplomacy should, as far as circumstances allow, institute an international commission of inquiry, to facilitate a solution of these differences by elucidating the facts by means of an impartial and conscientious investigation."

The United States signed this convention, but with the following reservation (p. 90):

"Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign States; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions."

The second Hague convention was signed on October 18, 1907. The United States delegates to this convention were Joseph H. Choate, Uriah M. Rose, Rear Admiral Charles S. Sperry, William I. Buchanan, Charles Henry Butler, Horace Porter, David Jayne Hill, Brig. Gen. George B. Davis, and James Brown Scott, Solicitor for Department of State.

Theodore Roosevelt was President and Elihu Root was Secretary of State when this convention was held.

In dealing with matters which can be submited to arbitration, article 19, paragraph 1 (i. d., p. 149) states:

"Recourse can not, however, be had to the court if the other party declares that in its opinion the dispute does not belong to the category of questions to be submitted to compulsory arbitration unless the treaty of arbitration confers upon the arbitration tribunal the power of deciding this preliminary question."

In The Hague peace conference of 1907, part 3, article 9 (i. d., p. 159), the following appears:

"In disputes of an international nature involving neither honor nor vital interest and arising from a difference of opinion on points of fact, the contracting parties deem it expedient and desirable that the parties who have not been able to come to an agreement by means of diplomacy should, so far as circumstances allow, institute an international commission of inquiry, to facilitate a solution of these disputes by elucidating the facts by means of an impartial and conscientious investigation."

Again (p. 178), in dealing with arbitration procedure we find that the permanent court is competent to sit in arbitration proceedings with the following exception in article 23, paragraph 1:

"Recourse can not, however, be had to the court if the other party declares that in its opinion the dispute does not belong to the category of disputes which can not be submitted to compulsory arbitration unless the treaty of arbitration confers upon the arbitration tribunal the power of deciding this preliminary question."

The United States accepted this convention with reservations, but the reservations do not appear to be specifically enumerated. (See i. d., p. 340.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the reservation proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], who is absent to-day on account of sickness. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that this announcement of the transfer of my pair may stand for the day. On this question I vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague, the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent on business of the Senate. I ask that this announcement stand for all roll calls to-day.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I inquire if the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence, I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that I have been paired, so that I am not at liberty to vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

So Mr. REED's reservation was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the reservation which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reservation offered by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, as a reservation, the following:

The United States assumes no obligation to employ its military or naval forces or resources or any form of economic discrimination under any article of the treaty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it can not be denied that under article 16 of the treaty, in the event any nation, however small or great, shall go to war in violation of the decree of the council of the league that thereupon ipso facto we are a party to that war. There is surely the implied understanding that we will play our part in the war by furnishing soldiers, ships, and money. There is the express and absolute understanding that we will assist in and become party to the economic boycott. The economic boycott is in fact war, and it is war in its worst form. The economic boycott can not be applied to a first-class nation for 24 hours without actual hostilities resulting. Not only is it the open door of actual hostilities, but it is in itself an act of war of the most terrible character.

I want to read what President Wilson had to say of the economic boycott. I read from his speech of September 13, 1919:

The boycott is an infinitely more terrible instrument of war. Excepting our own singularly fortunate country, I can not think of any other country that can live upon its own resources. The minute you lock the door, then the pinch of the thing becomes intolerable; not only the physical pinch, not only the fact that you can not get raw materials and must stop your factories, not only the fact that you can not get food and your people must begin to starve, not only the fact that your credit is stopped, that your assets are useless, but the still greater pinch that comes when a nation knows that it is sent to coventry and despised.

Mr. President, how is it possible to blockade the ports of a country, cut off its commerce, and starve its people without employing armed force? What great government would tamely submit to the destruction of its commerce, the closing of its ports, and the starvation of its people? It would at once meet force with force and actual war would be on. How long would the United States permit her ships to be seized? How long would she permit the ports of New York and Boston to be blockaded? How long would she submit her commerce to be destroyed upon the high seas? How long would she supinely submit to an attempt to starve her people? There would, sir, be war within 15 minutes after the point of contact was reached. The captain commanding an American merchantman would refuse to surrender his ship, and the guns of the dreadnoughts of the United States Navy would thunder in its defense. What is true of the United States is true of every nation capable of self-defense. This contract that we are entering into binds us to do these acts of war to other nations. We are put into the war not by the act of the Government of the United States, not by the vote of the Congress of the United States, not by any act of the people of the United States taken at the time, but we are placed in a state of war because we are now by this treaty solemnly agreeing that we will become parties to future wars the moment a foreign nation has dared disobey a mandate of the league.

We have been told here that the right is reserved to Congress in all instances to go into war or not to go into war as Congress may at the time see fit to declare; but the instances I have pointed out and the facts to which I have called attention demonstrate that unless the reservation I have offered is agreed to we can be put into any war of the world at any time without our volition and without the action of Congress. This is true, because we are now by this treaty agreeing to commit acts of war against a nation the moment some other nation has gone to war with some other nation contrary to the will of nine men sitting in Geneva.

I suppose this reservation will be defeated, just as the one that proposed to reserve to the American people the sole control over the national honor and the vital interests of the United States was defeated. Just as you voted a few minutes ago to turn the life of the United States over for decision to a tribunal composed exclusively of foreigners, so you will probably turn over to that tribunal the right to engulf us in a war without the act of Congress. Let the record show how American Senators stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks for the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May the Secretary state the reservation again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the reservation.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following as a separate reservation:

The United States assumes no obligation to employ its military or naval forces or resources or any form of economic discrimination under any article of the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reservation offered by the Senator from Missouri. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Repeating the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness, to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator. He is absent on official business; I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BECKHAM. In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Borah	Gronna	Norris	Wadsworth
Brandegee	Johnson, Calif.	Reed	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Kenyon	Sherman

So Mr. REED'S reservation was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the following reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the reservation proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add as a separate reservation the following words:

The United States assumes no obligation to employ its military or naval forces or resources under any article of the treaty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the reservation now offered simply makes it plain that we assume no obligation of any kind to employ our Army or Navy, or to furnish money, in any war unless Congress shall by appropriate resolution declare a state of war. Of course, everybody will understand that should any war hereafter arise in any part of the world the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, can at the time, acting in the light of the facts then existing, enter that war or remain out of it. But if we accept this treaty, there is under a number of its clauses the implied obligation that the United States will back its decrees with its military forces.

We are certainly bound to use our economic forces in support of the boycott, and, as I have already stated, a boycott could not exist as against a first-class nation 24 hours without hostilities resulting.

The Senate by the vote just taken has given two very plain constructions of the treaty. It has refused to accept a reservation which declared that the United States will not submit to any tribunal of the League of Nations questions involving its vital interest or its honor. By rejecting that reservation the Senate has, in substance, declared that this treaty does submit to a foreign tribunal—upon which the United States will not have a representative because it is a party to the controversy—the life and honor of the Nation. Moreover, the Senate has declared that it desires that the life and honor of the Nation shall be submitted to that foreign tribunal. Every man who voted against that reservation gave his construction to this treaty, and that construction was that we do submit our vital interests and national honor. When he voted against the reservation, he voted he was not willing to save to the people of the United States the control over the life of this Republic.

The Senate has just voted that it will not reserve to the United States the right to employ its arms or to engage in an economic warfare, which is, in fact, war, against countries with which we may not, by any act of Congress, be at war.

Every man who voted against that reservation voted for that construction of the treaty.

It will not do to argue against the reservation upon the ground that the treaty is susceptible to a construction which makes the reservation unnecessary. You know that any such construction is strained and that it can not be sustained. But if the treaty were susceptible of such a construction, and if it is desired that it should be so construed, then there can be no reasonable objection to making the treaty so plain and explicit that there will be no room left for future disputes.

The reservation offered simply declares that we assume no obligation to employ our Army or Navy or resources until and unless Congress shall declare a state of war; that we repudiate no obligation under the treaty to do so, leaving the Congresses of the future free to act.

Let us have the vote on that, then the country will know how the Senate of the United States has construed this treaty.

So, Mr. President, if there are no other remarks to be made, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before relative to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). Repeating the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I am informed that my pair, if present, would vote against this reservation. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I am paired, however, with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness. I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I transferred my pair a while ago to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I am not sure about his attitude with reference to this matter, and therefore I desire to withdraw my vote. If I were able to obtain a transfer, I would allow my vote to stand as I cast it.

Mr. EDGE. I announce my pair and withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—16.

Borah	Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Sherman
Brandegee	Gronna	Moses	Shields
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Wadsworth

So Mr. REED'S reservation was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty is still in Committee of the Whole and open to reservations or amendments. If there be no further reservations——

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I offer the following reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the reservation offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to add to the reservations the following:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when self-government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the reservation offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, to be added at the end of the proposed reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed reservation the following:

And the United States, also adhering to the principle of self-determination, declares its sympathy with the grievances and aspirations of the people of Korea for the restoration of their ancient kingdom and its emancipation from the tyranny of Japan, and it further declares that when so consummated it should be promptly admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on yesterday a reservation of import similar to that of the reservation offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] was tabled. If that action of the Senate is decisive, it should preclude a reconsideration of the subject. I am aware, however, that the Senate, as to matters of procedure, is a law unto itself and that Senators may feel reluctant to raise the point of order, since it might offend the political sensibilities of some elements of the voting population, something which few men have the courage to do when confronted by a rapidly approaching presidential election.

I do not think that this reservation or its subject matter is at all germane to the question of ratifying or rejecting the treaty. It is entirely foreign to it, in my opinion, but if it is to be considered at all—and it is quite evident that the purpose of the repeated efforts to secure a final vote upon the subject is more political than pertinent—it is only fair that the proposition be extended to other peoples similarly situated——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. And that is particularly true of the people of Korea. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why not extend it still further and include Algeria and Morocco, subjects of France, and Tunis and the Dedocanese Islands, now subjects of Italy?

Mr. THOMAS. If it is pertinent at all, it should be carried even further than that. It should include the Philippines——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; the Philippines.

Mr. THOMAS. And Porto Rico, Guam, and the Island of Yap. But I am only concerned with Korea. I believe that Korea occupies a position peculiarly appealing to the national sense of fairness and of right. I say that without in the slightest degree reflecting upon the equities of other peoples. Perhaps they may be superior to those of Korea. In my judgment, however, Korea appeals to us from a different and a more important standpoint than any other subject peoples; because we negotiated a treaty with Korea in 1882, if the nation were still an independent one that treaty would be in force. I call the attention of the Senate to its first article:

There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between the President of the United States and the King of Shoshon and the citizens and subjects of their respective governments. If other powers deal unjustly or oppressively with either Government the other will exercise their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their friendly feeling.

Sometime after the negotiation of this treaty Japan began to cast longing eyes upon that domain, and her interest in Korea was the underlying cause of two great wars—one with China, in consequence of which Japan assumed a protectorate over Korea; the other with Russia, at the end of which Japan assumed virtual dominion of Korea—but under covenants which bound her to respect and recognize the integrity and independence of that Kingdom.

The time came, however, when the Japanese policy changed, and in disregard of treaty stipulation she supplanted the Kingdom of Korea and incorporated that nation into the Japanese Empire. In that crisis the Korean Government under its treaty with us appealed to our Government for the exercise of its good will in her behalf. Mr. Roosevelt was then President. That great American, execrated in life and canonized in death, declined to exercise his good offices in behalf of that suffering Kingdom. Instead he treated article 1 of the treaty as a scrap of paper. He not only did not recognize the right or regard the request of Korea, but deliberately acquiesced in the attitude of Japan, thereby sanctioning her absorption of the Korean Kingdom. If therefore we are to indulge in reservations of this character, which I protest as wholly foreign to the treaty, we owe it to our sense of justice, to the facts, and in my judgment to our sense of obligation, to recognize the present efforts of the Korean people for independence, to extend to her that recognition which this reservation proposes as an element in the ratification of this treaty. It is chiefly for this reason that I am constrained again to offer this amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I raise the point of order against the reservation offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] as well as the tendered amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], for the reason that these reservations, if not in exact words and exact phraseology, at least in substance, have heretofore been offered, and a motion was made to lay the reservations on the table, and the motion prevailed. It seems to me the matter has been disposed of by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order, because the vote yesterday was upon the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to lay on the table the reservation proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which related to Egypt. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] as well as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] went to the table as a logical consequence. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the ruling of the Chair is entirely correct, because the reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island does present an entirely new matter. Furthermore this reservation is in entire harmony with the purpose of the League of Nations, and it is in entire harmony with the position heretofore taken by the Senate of the United States by an almost unanimous vote.

The Senate of the United States on June 6 of last year adopted a resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for self-government. I take it that was not intended to be a mockery; that it was not a hollow pretense; I take it that we must concede that the Senate intended, when it adopted that resolution, to say to the world that this body views with sympathy the efforts of the Irish people to secure self-government.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I object very much to contemptuously likening the efforts of the Irish people to secure self-government to the condition of Porto Rico or Guam or Hawaii. In those islands there is no organized effort to secure self-government, and, so far as we know, no disposition to secure separation from the United States. So far as the Philippines are concerned, the attitude of the United States has been a steady purpose to fit them for self-government, and to extend a larger and larger degree of self-government to them. I had the honor to conduct through this body the bill which greatly increased the degree of self-government enjoyed by the Philippine Islands, and to-day the people of the Philippine Archipelago control absolutely not only their lower house, which they originally controlled, but their upper house, or senate, and they have in their own hands the legislation for the Philippine Islands. Who now hears in the Senate of the United States or in the House of Representatives of the United States discussions relating to the government of the Philippine Islands? They virtually govern themselves.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the beneficent protection which they enjoy from the United States is such that they are to-day a loyal part of the United States. Our armed forces there are merely nominal, and I take it when the time comes that the Philippine people express, in a proper way, a desire for self-government, and Congress has had an opportunity to investigate the matter, the United States will give them complete self-government.

As to Ireland, everybody knows there is a great sentiment in the British Isles, a great sentiment in England, in favor of giving self-government to Ireland. Not only that, but the British Parliament has already passed one home-rule bill for Ireland, and is now engaged in the consideration of another home-rule bill for Ireland which will, it is expected, meet with a larger degree of favor in Ireland. The Irish question is a burning question not only in Great Britain, but it is a serious question in other countries. It disturbs the relations between the United States and Great Britain; and until the Irish question is settled the world will not be entirely free from international embarrassments.

So I say, Mr. President, if we meant what we said when we voted for the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for self-government, we can support this reservation.

Moreover, the league itself contains a provision that self-governing colonies, dominions, and States shall be entitled to representation in the League of Nations. Why, therefore, is it not proper for us to say that when Ireland attains the degree of self-government mentioned in the League of Nations covenant, it ought to become a member of the League of Nations and have a vote in the assembly?

Mr. President, I have stood here and argued against the proposition that the United States should attempt to disfranchise Canada, or to disfranchise Australia, or to disfranchise South Africa, or to disfranchise New Zealand. They are self-governing colonies of the British Empire, and we ought to encourage them to a greater degree of independence. We ought not to slam the door in their faces and say that they must be represented by the British Government. We ought to encourage their efforts to a greater degree of independence; we ought to do everything to permit them to enter into a larger degree of self-government. So, in the case of Ireland, there is no reason under the sun why the United States should not say in this reservation that when Ireland secures that degree of self-government which we believe her people will secure, and which we have already declared they ought to secure, we, the people of the United States, believe that Ireland should be admitted to membership in the League of Nations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If this reservation is adopted, is it the intention of the Senator to vote for the resolution of ratification of the treaty with the reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That will depend on the adoption of other reservations. I shall not vote for the ratification of the treaty if reservations are adopted which destroy its purpose; but that does not prevent me from voting for a reservation which I believe proper. I hope that we shall have a vote upon this reservation.

So far as the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is concerned, I can see no objection to it; I can see no reason why we should not say also in this reservation that if Korea obtains the degree of self-government which we believe Ireland will secure, then we believe that Korea should be represented in the assembly of the League of Nations. There are other nations represented in the assembly which are no more entitled to representation than the old Korean Kingdom should be entitled to representation.

So I am not antagonizing the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. I believe it is less practicable; Korean independence is not a burning question. There is not the likelihood that Korea will secure from the Japanese Government self-government and home rule that there is that Ireland will secure the right to self-government and home rule from the British Empire.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, there is one question which I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota. As I understand, this reservation declares that when Ireland has attained self-government——

Mr. KELLOGG. I can not yield, for my time is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Minnesota. Does he yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I shall not seek to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I merely wish the attention of the Senate for a moment. I am opposed to the reservation which has been offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] for two reasons.

It means, of course, if it is adopted, that the treaty will never be ratified or accepted if it is ratified. Secondly, Mr. President, it is opposed to every principle of international law and to the rights of sovereign States; and I do not think that the United States Senate can afford to go on record in oppositon to those principles.

I do not oppose the reservation through any lack of sympathy for the Irish people; I sympathize with their aspirations and with the aspirations of any race for self-government; but the doctrine of self-determination can not possibly mean that a state or a province of a sovereign nation shall be backed in secession or in a demand for self-government against a country which is controlling. Of course, I am in favor of self-determination.

If France desires to change her form of government from that of a representative democracy to that of a pure democracy or a constitutional monarchy, it should have the absolute right to do so without interference by any other nation.

Mr. BORAH. Just as Germany is doing it now.

Mr. KELLOGG. A people have a right to such self-determination. But, Mr. President, suppose that Provence, in France says, "We propose to secede from the sovereign nation of France and to vote for self-determination and a separate government," are we to place in the League of Nations a declaration that the power of all the nations belonging to the league shall back Provence in secession against the Republic of France? That is exactly what the reservation means.

Mr. President, as I asked on yesterday, what would have happened to the United States if such a doctrine had been invoked by the sovereign nations of the world in 1861 when the Union was hanging in the balance in the face of a terrible war? Are Senators willing to place themselves on record before the world in favor of self-determination of portions of sovereign nations? I do not deny the right of any part of a nation to secede if it can do so, as we rebelled in 1776; but that is a different proposition from the one embraced in the pending reservation.

Then, the right of other nations to recognize their belligerency is a matter of which no other nation can complain; whether belligerency shall be recognized is a question for the recognizing State; but are we prepared now to say that any part of any sovereign State which determines to set up a separate Government shall receive our support? That is what the pending reservation means. It says:

> In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination.

When did the United States become a party to any such doctrine of self-determination, will you tell me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, I will say it was probably before the period between 1861 and 1865 that it was announced to the world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not the time to yield, as I only have a few moments more.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was going to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I simply desire to answer the Senator's question by saying that they became attached to that principle in 1776.

Mr. KELLOGG. Not at all; that was a question of whether the colonies would secede; that was not a declaration that every nation in the world would lend its support to such a doctrine. It is an entirely different doctrine, Mr. President.

I repeat, I sympathize with Ireland. We adopted a resolution on June 6, 1919, expressing our sympathy for the Irish people. Can we add to it by expressing it again? It has no place upon this treaty.

All I say is that the Senate of the United States ought not to place its approval upon a document declaring that it will support the self-determination of any portion of any sovereign nation to secede and to set up a separate government. Nobody can complain if this Nation recognizes the belligerency of Ireland if she shall secede; but to announce the doctrine that we will at all times place our approval upon the secession of a part of a sovereign nation is something that I do not think we ought to do.

Let us express ourselves for the aspirations of the Irish people. I have as great an admiration for them as any of you. In reading her long history we learn that she has produced many statesmen and orators of surpassing ability; but there are everlasting principles of constitutional law and government which we ought not lightly to set aside in a struggle against this treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is true that Ireland is not mentioned in this treaty, and yet Ireland is in it as completely and as fully as though she were mentioned on every page of the ponderous document.

This treaty, if approved, will give our sanction and our approval to the continuation of the domination of the Irish people by Great Britain, as she has dominated her and controlled her against her consent for the last 700 years. Those leaders who met at Versailles, and held in the palms of their hands the destiny of the world, knew that they had promised to the world during the Great War a new régime, a new deal. They had promised that we should have a treaty based upon the doctrine that weak nations should be protected the same as strong nations; that the right of self-determination should be recognized; that conquest should be forever ended.

Mr. President, all of those pledges were violated. Perhaps I ought to say that one of them was not violated, because the treaty, if it could be carried out, would give force to that promise that said there should be no more conquest; but the only reason that pledge is kept is because there is nothing left to conquer. Knowing these promises that had been given to the civilized people of the world, those who had it in control were careful to see that before this new régime went into effect they would divide up the world among themselves. They proceeded to do it. They did do it. They took the wire entanglements that were left from the battle fields of the war and built a fence around them. And so Ireland, though not mentioned by name, has her destiny sealed and her subjugation extended for all time; and we, when we approve it, underwrite the job and mortgage the lifeblood of unborn generations to make it good.

Mr. President, if there were provided any place in this treaty where a nation or a people controlled by another nation without their consent would have an opportunity to be heard, would have a tribunal where they might go and have the question of their independence passed on by an unbiased and a fair court, then there might be something said against this reservation. There is no such provision in this treaty. There is no such machinery. It is final. It is to go on forever. And even if there were such a provision, where some people like the Irish people might be heard, what kind of a tribunal would they come before? Would you expect these nations who will be able to control the council, having tucked away in their pockets the title deeds to millions of square miles of territory and to millions of people without their consent, to give justice to any of those peoples by taking away from any of them any part of their ill-gotten gains? Would Japan, with China and Korea tucked under her belt, give honest consideration to such a proposition? Would France, with her acquired territory, be competent to sit as an unbiased juror in such a case? Would Great Britain, with 13,000,000 Egyptians held in bondage—yes, would Great Britain, with her six votes, sitting on the coffin lid of the Emerald Isle—be expected to give proper consideration to any nation held against its will in a hearing in that tribunal?

No, Mr. President; this is intended to stifle forever the voice of freedom that comes from Ireland. For 700 years they have been held in subjection. Everybody, everywhere on earth, admits that they are competent to control themselves and to govern themselves. That question is excluded. Everybody admits, as far as I know, that they are held against their will, and that they have been held by means that are neither honest nor fair.

It is said by the Senator from Minnesota, "Why should we recognize secession in this treaty? Why should we interfere in the affairs of Great Britain?"

Mr. President, under ordinary conditions, under normal conditions, I would not favor a proposition of this kind; but we are not confronted with those conditions. We have to act on this treaty, and this treaty seals the doom of Ireland forever. Here at our gates is Great Britain, together with her interlocking connections of wealth in every financial center of the United States, asking us to put our seal of approval upon Ireland's death. That is the condition that is before us. True, we are not to blame for it, but it is here; and when we are asked to do that, Mr. President, I am ready to take the other horn of the dilemma and say not only that we will not give Ireland into bondage but that we will write our judgment into this treaty.

Mr. President, even if those autocrats of Versailles who held the destinies of the world in their hands believe that they can end forever the struggle of Ireland and the struggle of other peoples trying to get freedom and liberty, they can not succeed. It is contrary to the law of human nature. As long as a just God reigns in heaven you can not kill the spirit of liberty and human freedom, and it will continue to live even though death is inflicted. It is part of the very depths of the human soul, and it can not be killed, and it can not be destroyed.

We can not compare the Irish question with the other suggestions that are made here. You can not compare it with the Philippines, with Guam, or some other proposition where the vital question involved is whether or not the people are able to govern themselves, whether or not they have sufficient ability and intelligence to govern themselves.

That question is not involved here. It is admitted that Ireland has that ability; and when that question is settled, I am willing to take up similar matters with any subject people, whether held by the United States or any other nation.

I repeat, Mr. President, we can not escape acting upon this proposition. It is not here on our volition. We are asked to say now whether we will help Great Britain to forever hold in subjection an unwilling and enlightened people struggling for the same liberty and freedom that we enjoy.

It seems to me that if we still adhere to the doctrine promulgated by the sacred Declaration of Independence, upon whose principles our liberty is dependent and is founded, we must give our assistance and our voice to the struggling people of Ireland, whose ability and whose desire for self-government are absolutely unquestioned.

Let me call your attention, Mr. President, to the fact that Ireland is the only English-speaking race in the world asking for independence and still held in subjection. It is said, and I believe that is the only defense made by Great Britain, that she must hold Ireland because Ireland is so close to Great Britain. Yet, Mr. President, Ireland is not as close to Great Britain as Belgium and Holland or as Holland and Belgium are to Germany, as France and Italy are to Switzerland, or as Canada is to the United States. If that doctrine is good, then we have a right to take Canada into our possession, because she is next to us; and, to reverse the doctrine, if that is a good principle, then Great Britain has a right to dominion over the United States, because we are next to Canada.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the hearts of the American people can be nowhere else except in sympathy with a struggling people, who have been trying, through all kinds of difficulties, during all these years that have passed, to gain for themselves the liberty which we enjoy and which we would defend unto death. It strikes me, therefore, that this reservation, even if it went much further, should be approved by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, it is perfectly evident that the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was proposed for the purpose of killing the reservation. I therefore move to table the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to table the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado may be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Add, at the end of the proposed reservation of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the following:

> And the United States, also adhering to the principle of self-determination, declares its sympathy with the grievances and aspirations of the people of Korea for the restoration of their ancient Kingdom and its emancipation from the tyranny of Japan; and it further declares that when so consummated it should be promptly admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	La Follette	Robinson
Ball	Gay	Lenroot	Sheppard
Beckham	Gerry	Lodge	Shields
Borah	Glass	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Gronna	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Hale	McNary	Spencer
Chamberlain	Harris	Moses	Stanley
Colt	Harrison	Myers	Sterling
Comer	Henderson	New	Thomas
Culberson	Hitchcock	Norris	Townsend
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Wadsworth
Dial	Kellogg	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Kenyon	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Keyes	Pomerene	Watson
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS. I am informed that the pending motion is a motion to table the amendment which I offered to the reservation of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to inquire whether that would not, if carried, dispose of the entire subject?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question addressed to the Chair by the Senator from Colorado is answered, I think, by Rule XVII, as follows:

> When an amendment proposed to any pending measure is laid on the table, it shall not carry with it, or prejudice, such measure.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the wording of the rule, Mr. President, but rules do not go very far with the Senate. I should like to have the opinion of the Presiding Officer on the subject.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I suggest to the Chair that under Rule XVII it is perfectly plain that if the Senate should vote to table the amendment it would not carry the entire reservation to the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of a rule, it is the opinion of the Chair that the motion does carry with it the entire question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I be heard on that for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE (reading):

> When an amendment proposed to any pending measure is laid on the table it shall not carry with it, or prejudice, such measure.

It seems to me nothing could be plainer than that rule. It is done to prevent carrying the main measure to the table by laying an amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the plain language of the rule is superior to the previously announced opinion of the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not understand the last expression of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated, in effect, that he thinks the recorded rule is plain, and that, the opinion of the Chair to the contrary notwithstanding, the motion does not carry with it the reservation.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the opinion of the Chair is the better law. I desire, if I can, therefore, to offer as an amendment to the motion that the entire subject be laid on the table.

Mr. LODGE. That is not in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that a motion to lay a matter on the table is not amendable.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not amendable and it is not debatable.

Mr. ASHURST. Nor divisible.

Mr. THOMAS. I will make the motion just the same. If the Chair overrules me, I am content.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the motion is not in order. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the pending reservation.

Mr. THOMAS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. Let us go on record.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. MOSES. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Therefore I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I have a pair, however, with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness. I have been unable to transfer that pair. So I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STANLEY. I am advised that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] if present would vote "yea." Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have just been informed that my pair, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], has not voted. As I am unable to get a transfer, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], and as I am unable to obtain a transfer I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. MYERS. I have just been informed that I can transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. That I do and ask that my vote may stand as recorded.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are absent, engaged on official business.

The roll call resulted—yeas 34, nays 34, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote the yeas are 34 and the nays are 34. The motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Colorado on the table is therefore lost. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I move to lay the reservation—the whole matter——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not make that motion just yet. I should like the privilege of speaking on the question. I have not taken any time as yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator makes the motion, I can not help it; I am cut off.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not wish to deprive the Senator of an opportunity to speak on it, but I understood that the Senator intended to offer an amendment. If he only wishes to speak——

Mr. LODGE. I do intend to offer an amendment, and I should like to be heard upon it by the Senate, unless the Senator chooses to cut me off.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will withhold the motion to lay upon the table, if he is intending to make one, I simply wish to say that we have a unanimous-consent agreement, made yesterday, which I understood gives each Senator 15 minutes upon every reservation or amendment offered. Here is a reservation proposed. I have said nothing. I want to say a few words, not occupying over 5 minutes. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] spoke at length upon it, and I hardly think that we ought to be cut off on a motion to table after it was agreed that we could speak 15 minutes, if we wanted to do so. It seems to me it is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. It was agreed that we should have 15 minutes apiece, and to make such a motion cuts us all off.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator does not mean that it can not be made ultimately? It can be made after all debate is over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. After every Senator who desires has had his 15 minutes the unanimous-consent agreement cuts off any further debate; but it seems to me that a motion to table is clearly in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not wish to deprive anyone of discussing reservations and amendments; therefore I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BORAH. It is just on that point that I wanted to say a word. It is not a question of obliging anyone. I think the Senator from Minnesota, upon reflection, will see that he had no right to make the motion. It was subject to a point of order, and I want that understood from this time on. If the unanimous-consent agreement means anything it means that each Senator has 15 minutes upon any reservation or amendment that is offered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the impression of the Chair that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] had not formally submitted a motion. He had indicated a purpose, but there was no motion formally before the Senate. So the matter is disposed of, and the Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment respecting the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The unanimous consent is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that no Senator shall speak more than 15 minutes in all on any reservation or on any amendment now pending or that may hereafter be offered.

This constitutes a mere limitation on debate. It is observable that the unanimous consent does not suspend the rule of the Senate authorizing the motion to table. Clearly, as a matter of law, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] had a right to make the motion if he chose to do so.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, I yield for a parliamentary inquiry. I am obliged to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota will state it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to ask the Chair if the unanimous-consent agreement cuts off the right to make a motion to lay on the table any reservation or amendment thereto?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to object, while the Senator from Massachusetts has the floor, to having the Chair pass on that question in advance. If the Chair does pass on it, there is going to be some debate on it, and there will probably be an appeal. It is not before the Senate. It is academic entirely. Personally, I am opposed to any Senator making a motion to lay on the table, and I shall vote against it now or in the future while this debate is on; but I believe Senators have a right to make it. I do not want to be foreclosed, but I do not want to argue it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Nebraska has stated the case admirably. The question is not before the Senate, and the Chair therefore withholds any ruling upon it. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I voted in favor of the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and I did so not that I lack in sympathy for the people of Korea, for I feel the deepest sympathy for them, as every right-thinking man must; but the real question before the Senate, which the Senate desires to have settled, is whether we shall say anything in these reservations in regard to Ireland. I think we had better meet the question now squarely and decide whether we shall or not; otherwise it will be perpetually before us during the hours that remain for the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. President, the Senate, with the exception of one vote, passed a resolution of sympathy with Ireland and for her aspirations for self-government. She comes before us again in this proposed reservation asking for a renewal of that expression of sympathy, but the reservation which has been offered carries with it a statement of a very wide, far-reaching principle, that we adhere to the principle of self-determination. That involves almost every country in the world. No country regards it; no country feels bound by it. It is to my mind pure hypocrisy to have such a suggestion come from a country which fought for four years to destroy the right of self-determination.

We should fight again if one or more States of this Union tried to break up the Union, and we all know we should prevent it. Are we prepared to make a sovereign nation out of the Virgin Islands, which we bought from Denmark for our own self-defense, or yield our control of the Panama Canal to a plebescite on the Isthmus? We know very well we are not ready to do so.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. No; I have only 15 minutes, and I should like my own time, if the Senator will allow me. I value the Senator's additions to what I may say——

Mr. KING. I want to make a contribution to the Senator's argument.

Mr. LODGE. But I shall be glad if the Senator will allow me, as my time is very short, to continue.

Mr. KING. I certainly will allow the Senator from Massachusetts to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Therefore, I propose to amend the reservation by striking out the words "to the principle of self-determination, and" in lines 2 and 3, and in order, perhaps, to make it read a little better, in line 7, to insert after the word "consummation" the word "which," and after the words "it is hoped is" insert the word "now," so as to read, "which it is hoped is now at hand."

Mr. President, we have all expressed our sympathy with Ireland many times, particularly in public speeches. I believe in what is set forth in this reservation, and I think it is perfectly proper we should express it. There is nothing offensive in the language; it is an expression of opinion and an expression of a hope, which I for one share. The Irish people are large in numbers. I need not enter upon their eulogy. We know their qualities; we know their character; we know that there are millions of people of Irish descent in this country whose desires and wishes it is absolutely proper that we should recognize, if it is suitable so to do.

Mr. President, I desire to get rid of the general principle that is embodied in the reservation, because I think it is unreal; it does not exist in the treaty at all, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has pointed out. I should like to detach the proposition in regard to Ireland from the statement of adhering to the principle of self-determination and to adopt the remainder of it as it stands, except for the two verbal changes I have proposed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How would the reservation read as amended?

Mr. LODGE. It would read as proposed to be amended:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice, adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when self-government is attained by Ireland, a consummation which it is hoped is now at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Chair is advised that the motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on the table did not prevail.

Mr. LODGE. It did not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And therefore the question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LODGE. This is an amendment only in the second degree, and I offer it as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts offers——

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw my amendment, Mr. President, until the question in regard to Korea is disposed of.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I should like to say that before I offered my motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Colorado on the table it was apparent that all Senators who wished to speak on the amendment had finished speaking, and that it was simply a question of a vote. I purposely waited until that time before I moved to lay the amendment on the table, and did not make the motion in order to prevent debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am one of the Senators in this Chamber who would like to go on record in favor of the application of the principle of self-determination to Korea. I voted against tabling the amendment of the Senator from Colorado because I did not purpose even by an indirect vote to record myself against the application of this principle to any race of people capable of setting up and maintaining a stable government of their own choice. I have overlooked even the motive that was possibly involved in the presentation of the Korean amendment, for it is suggested that it has been offered to injure the reservation introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island. In order that the Senate may declare its honest convictions in the matter of Korea, I desire to move to strike out the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado the language that some Senators may object to because it may be considered offensive to Japan. The Senate may then be permitted to vote on the straight question of sympathy for Korea and not vote against this Korean amendment simply because the language used is offensive to one of our allies—in this instance Japan. In other words, we ought not to trifle with the causes of peoples who are looking for self-government; we should either remove these issues from the Senate or squarely and fairly meet them in a spirit of whole-hearted sympathy.

The amendment of the Senator from Colorado contains this language:

And its emancipation from the tyranny of Japan.

I am not disputing or questioning the facts to which these words relate, but we are dealing here with a great international compact, and I think these words are objectionable. We can meet this issue by declaring where America stands and express our sympathy with Korea by the elimination of those objectionable words, so that the amendment will read as follows:

And the United States, also adhering to the principle of self-determination, declares its sympathy with the grievances and aspirations of the people of Korea for the restoration of their ancient kingdom—

Then omitting the words "and its emancipation from the tyranny of Japan"— and it further declares that when so consummated it should be promptly admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Will the Senator from Colorado accept the amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. I will very cheerfully accept the amendment, and I think it is an improvement upon the original.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That will permit the presentation to the Senate of the issue squarely without offensive language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado accepts the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts and modifies his amendment accordingly.

Mr. LODGE. I move to strike out the words "also adhering to the principle of self-determination."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I accept the amendment, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lies with the Senator from Colorado to accept or reject the proposed amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I inserted that clause because I tried to copy as nearly as possible the language of the original reservation. I have no pride of construction in the matter, and, if the Senator from Massachusetts thinks it would improve the amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that it will improve it sufficiently to enable me to vote for it.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, I will accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado accepts the suggestion and modifies the amendment accordingly. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

And the United States declares its sympathy with the grievances and aspirations of the people of Korea for the restoration of their ancient kingdom; and it further declares that when so consummated it should be promptly admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado accepts the suggestion and modifies the amendment accordingly. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

And the United States declares its sympathy with the grievances and aspirations of the people of Korea for the restoration of their ancient kingdom; and it further declares that when so consummated it should be promptly admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course the reservation as amended does not mean anything except an expression of sympathy and a hope that the Korean Nation may ultimately suffer a calamity by being put into the League of Nations.

As originally drawn, omitting the words that might seem to be unnecessarily harsh toward Japan, which the Senator from Colorado consented to withdraw, the reservation did amount to a declaration that the people of Korea had the right to determine their own destiny. By withdrawing the words "adhering to the principle of self-determination" we consent, of course, to the abandonment of that principle, and, the words having been offered, their withdrawal amounts to a repudiation by the Senate of that principle.

The process of emasculation through which this reservation in regard to Ireland, forming the basis for amendments, has gone is highly amusing. We started out by declaring that Ireland ought to be at once given her liberty. That was defeated by a legislative maneuver which some might say was a legislative "trick." I prefer to refer to it as a very skillful maneuver. The reservation as now offered does not express the slightest concern about Ireland obtaining her liberty.

Now we have a reservation that when Ireland secures the right from Great Britain to govern herself she then is to be cordially invited to become a member of a League of Nations which Great Britain will completely dominate. Of course, Ireland will not obtain her liberties until Great Britain sees fit to give them, and Great Britain will never voluntarily give her genuine liberty. If Ireland secures the right of colonial government similar to that of Canada, she will get it only because Great Britain is obliged to yield it in response to the eternal and deathless protests of the Irish people against their wrongs, backed by the sentiment of the world, and especially of America. So that what we are doing by this reservation is nothing but expressing some sympathy and the hope that Ireland will some day get her liberty, or secure self-government when Great Britain sees fit to give it. It is nothing but an empty sound; it does nothing for Ireland; it gives to her no benefits. By the process of amendment we have taken out of the reservation everything of value.

I am reminded of a somewhat ancient anecdote. A celebrated British wit passing in front of a shop where a fishmonger had a lot of fish laid out, manifestly for sale, observed over them the sign, "Fresh fish for sale to-day." He said to the man: "Why do you say 'to-day'? That is surplusage. Why not strike out the word 'to-day'? Everybody knows they are for sale to-day." So the fellow painted out that part of the sign. Another wag came along and said, "Why do you put in 'for sale'? Anybody who has sense knows that the fish are here for sale." So he wiped out that part of the sign. A third jester happened by and said, "Why have you the words 'fresh fish' over your stand? Do you suppose people think they are not fresh? By putting in the word 'fresh' you cast an imputation upon the character of your own fish. The presumption ought to be that they are fresh, and anybody can see they are fish." So he painted out those words and had no sign at all. That is what is left of the Irish reservation. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise simply to say that the amendment tendered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] expresses a hope for the restoration of the ancient kingdom of Korea. I think probably this is the first time it has been proposed that the Congress of the United States, or either branch of the Congress of the United States, should go on record in favor of the restoration of a monarchical form of government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Inasmuch as we are already about to associate with a more ancient kingdom, now dominating Korea, I think it is perfectly appropriate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, we all understand the humorous trait in the character of the Senator from Colorado. If the proposition of the independence of Korea came up as an independent one here, in undoubted good faith, I should be disposed to favor it in any proper way; but while I do not desire at all to impugn the good purpose of the Senator, or the intensity of his devotion to the independence of Korea, we can not escape the conclusion that this amendment was sought to be put upon the reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island for the purpose of killing it. I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in addition to the suggestion just made by the Senator from Montana, I point out the fact that this is quite an unusual provision. While the Senate of the United States, under the Constitution, is a part of the treaty-making power, I question the right of the Senate to bind the United States by a declaration like this. This is not a reservation to any provision in the treaty. The Senate might express its sympathy, but it has no right to express the sympathy of the United States under the pretense of exercising the treaty-making power.

The form of the reservation is as follows:

> And the United States declares its sympathy with the grievances and aspirations of the people of Korea for the restoration of their ancient kingdom—

And so forth. By what authority does the Senate presume, if indeed it should adopt such a reservation, to express the sympathy of the United States? The Senate may express its own sympathy. It has neither the power nor the right to express the sympathy of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire whether the Senator from Colorado has not already spoken on this amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. My purpose was not to speak on the amendment, although I have not consumed my 15 minutes——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So that it may be understood, the Chair will state that the unanimous-consent agreement does not limit the number of times a Senator may speak.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly aware of that, Mr. President, but I nevertheless did not intend to make any extended remarks upon the subject. I merely wished to remind the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that nearly every reservation so far adopted uses the words "United States," and not "the Senate," and this is an amendment to a proposed reservation.

Mr. REED. And this is a contract of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. If, therefore, the criticism is sound, it is applicable to nearly every reservation so far adopted.

Inasmuch as the Senator from Montana, inspired, doubtless, by the very amusing anecdote of the Senator from Missouri, makes objection to the words "the ancient kingdom of," I ask to amend my amendment, also recognizing the pertinency of the anecdote, by striking out the words "the ancient kingdom of."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be modified accordingly.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the Senate has as much authority to make this expression of sympathy for Korea as it has to delegate, in part, the sovereignty of the United States to a supergovernment sitting in a foreign country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I take it, from the statement of the Senator from Tennessee, that he admits that the Senate alone has no power, under the treaty-making power, to declare the sympathy of the United States with any nation or with any people.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senate alone?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, yes; I think the Senate has.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate undoubtedly is a part of the treaty-making power.

Mr. SHIELDS. Unquestionably.

Mr. ROBINSON. But by no principle can a resolution of sympathy be held to be the execution of the treaty-making power.

Mr. SHIELDS. But if it goes in the treaty it is the action of the entire treaty-making power. I do not quite understand the point the Senator from Arkansas is making. I think there is a great deal in this treaty that neither the Senate nor the entire treaty-making power has a right to do.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that that is the position of the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think I will not yield any further. The conversation seems to be getting so general among the Senators that I think I will say something myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as my time is limited, I can not yield to all the Senators who want to argue among themselves about something in which I am not concerned.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would the Senator mind yielding to me for just one moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to that one Senator; yes.

Mr. REED. I simply wish to say that if the United States has the power to set up a government insuring to Japan that she shall forever hold Korea as a vassal, we ought at least to have the right to express some sympathy for Korea under the circumstances.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Replying to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the Senate has no right to express the opinion of the United States, I would entirely agree with that if I thought it was what we are trying to do. This reservation, however, must be construed in the light of how it will be read as a part of the treaty. Of course, the treaty, if the ratifications of it shall be exchanged with the other signatory powers, would express the view of the United States. This is simply a proposition to put that into the treaty.

Mr. President, the Senate did, on June 6, 1919, again in the exercise of its own business and its own jurisdiction, pass the following resolution:

> Resolved, That the Senate of the United States express its sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of its own choice.

In my opinion that means something more than mere local self-government. Where a nation chooses its own form of government it comes pretty near being independent, and what the Senate did was to express the sympathy of the United States "with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of its own choice." I think that was very proper and it is right in line with my idea of what self-determination means.

It does seem to me that a great and homogeneous nation in some way or other has a right to a government satisfactory to itself. At any rate, that is the way I would feel about any nation of which I was a member.

This proposed reservation, while I expect to vote for it, comes in a way that is not quite satisfactory to me. The Senator who offers it now himself voted on yesterday to table a reservation containing this same subject. To be sure, that reservation extended our sympathies to other great peoples. However, inasmuch as this reservation is now before us, pertaining distinctly to the Irish people, upon which the Senate has already expressed its opinion, I shall vote for it again.

I do not know whether I shall vote for that part of it offered as an amendment by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] which drags in the Korean question, because the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the author of the present proposed reservation, seems to think that that would, as he expressed it, have the effect of killing the present reservation. Whether it would or not is a matter of judgment; but, at any rate, I do not care to take that chance, and inasmuch as this was originally designed to fit the Irish question, I expect to vote against the Korean part of it, although I would vote for a separate reservation in relation to Korea if it should be offered.

I call attention to the fact, however, that the present reservation, in lines 5 and 6, states:

> And declares that when self-government is obtained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

I am not so enthusiastic about that part of the reservation. In the first place, I do not know whether, if Ireland gets her independence, she will want to be a member of the League of Nations or not. Secondly, if she did, I do not think such an expression as this in a reservation would have a very substantial effect in helping them to do it. The treaty itself provides how self-governing parts of empires may become members of the league, without any expression of opinion by the Senate. The treaty provides that any self-governing dependency of any member of the league is eligible for membership. If Ireland should become a self-governing country, like Canada, I believe it would be eligible for membership in the League of Nations, if Great Britain and the other British colonies would admit her.

However that may be, I take great pleasure in voting for this reservation in some form, the exact nature of which has not yet been determined, because it adheres to the Senate resolution adopted on June 6, 1919, which expressed the sympathy of the Senate with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope my position in regard to Ireland will not be misunderstood; but I am opposed not only to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] but to the original reservation, even as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. President, this is not a reservation of anything to which the treaty relates. It is not a reservation in regard to any covenant of the treaty, or any stipulation found in the treaty, nor does it limit in any way the power conferred upon the assembly or the council of the League of Nations as provided for in the treaty. It has no relation, as a reservation, therefore, to the treaty or the covenant of the League of Nations. It is something entirely foreign to it.

What do we mean by "self-government" in this proposed reservation? The discussion here this morning, Mr. President, has been a little vague. It is yet uncertain what is meant by "self-government," as the term is used in this reservation. Does it mean home rule for Ireland? With that I am in sympathy, if the Irish people themselves can so agree that England can give them home rule. I think the sentiment in England is for home rule, and that the great difficulty is with the Irish people themselves. Their own dissensions have prevented home rule.

Or does it mean an independent sovereignty? Is that what "self-government" means here? Mr. President, we might well question, indeed, I think, considering conditions in Ireland now, considering the divisions among the Irish people themselves, as to whether the Irish people are quite fitted for independent self-government at the present time.

I think Senators may well have in mind conditions in Ireland but a short time ago, and what might have happened but for the power and promptness of England at that time in quelling sedition and rebellion. We recall the days of Sir Roger Casement, the days of the revolutionary Sinn Fein movement in Ireland during the desperate days of the war, and how their success, had they achieved it, might have been the determining factor, adverse to us and adverse to the success of the allied cause and to the civilization of the world.

Mr. President, I do not believe in further complicating things in the face of what has happened, in the face of present-day conditions in Ireland, by gratuitously here in this treaty and covenant of a League of Nations advising England that Ireland should have independence and self-government at once. I think that now, considering the attitude of British statesmen at the present time, we can well leave this great problem of Great Britain's to be worked out by herself and by her statesmen.

Mr. President, while we may express our sympathy for Ireland at a proper time and in a proper place, this treaty and covenant, it seems to me is foreign to that subject and is not the proper place for the insertion of this reservation relating to the self-government of Ireland.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have endeavored, as best I could, to determine the real purpose for offering these two reservations. I think I can understand the purpose of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in offering the amendment to the reservation of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. It occurs to me it was done, and properly so, for the purpose of showing the improper and unwise position of the Senator from Rhode Island in offering his own or first reservation.

But the first reservation offered is clearly for political purposes. I do not care to impugn the motives which actuate Senators in offering amendments, but it is evident that there is no more reason for offering this reservation than there is for offering a similar one for a dozen other propositions under this treaty. It must have occurred to some one that it would be a good thing for politicians to have the support of the Irish citizens of the United States, and that this possibly would secure it. But I have learned this, Mr. President, that the Irishman is a pretty good politician, and he is not very easily fooled by any such nonsense as this which is presented now to the Senate. Senators who are favoring article 10 unamended are now supporting this reservation. They are absolutely inconsistent. Nothing is likely to result to the advantage of the Irish nation from this reservation—not the slightest benefit in the world. It is not pertinent to the treaty; it must have been projected into this debate for some purpose other than benefit to Ireland.

Mr. President, we have been contending here for months, and the majority of us have felt that it was the duty of the United States to keep out of the turmoils of the Old World as much as possible. One of the objections I have had to this treaty was that it seemed to involve us in all the difficulties of Europe. I wanted to preserve the Monroe doctrine, and therefore I was perfectly willing to yield the same rights to the Old World that I was asking for my own under the Monroe doctrine. It is presumptuous for us in this treaty to interfere with the internal affairs of any foreign nation. Here we are proposing to use some kind of influence to be exerted upon Great Britain in her relations with Ireland.

Mr. President, I would like to make the motion to table the whole thing. But Senators rise and say they want to talk. Of course they want to talk. Of course, the only object in presenting it is to give them opportunity to talk for the benefit of the voters at home. That is the object. I have as many Irish friends, probably, as any other Senator in this body; but they are real friends, and they are men of intelligence, and they are not fooled at all by anything of this kind. They know it is a meaningless proposition. I would like indeed to move to table the whole proposition, the original reservation plus the amendment which has been offered. A motion was made to table the Korean proposition, and nobody found any fault with that; nobody raised his voice in this Chamber to protest against such action.

We do not have very many Koreans in this country, and I do not imagine they cast very many votes. But when it was suggested that the whole proposition should be, as it ought to be, considered together, then there is objection made. It is trespassing upon the rights of Senators to move, as we clearly had a right to move under the unanimous-consent agreement, to table the whole proposition.

So, Mr. President, if some other Senators want to use their 15 minutes in talking about Ireland I will withhold the motion. But eventually I want to make it if I can get recognition. I will not make the motion now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am of the opinion, and have been of that opinion all the time, that there can be no proper place or time for the Senate of the United States, a coordinate branch of the Federal Government, to express its opinion in favor of the territorial dismemberment of any of our recent allies.

I am furthermore of the opinion that the League of Nations is an international affair and not an affair dealing with the domestic concerns of any country. It is a body which deals with the relations of nations, not peoples hoping to be nations, but nations themselves already independent, already sovereign, and already equal.

The effect, if not the purpose, of these two propositions, the Irish one and the Korean one, will be to put the vote of Great Britain and the vote of Japan against our admission to the League of Nations. So that, of course, if any man wants us to stay out of the League of Nations he can pursue no better plan than to vote for these two reservations, and thereby secure the vote of both of those recent associates of the United States in the Great War against our admission. Of course, no nation is going to hesitate about resenting our interference in its domestic and internal concerns. No nation will hesitate to resent that by simply refusing to admit us to the League of Nations.

It is a curious thing that we should go through a great war, the greatest the world ever knew, and then begin at once to advocate schemes for dismembering, territorially speaking, our late allies or associates. I thought that we were fighting Germany in the late war. If you take up this sort of thing and go through with it, you had better go a good deal further. Certainly France did not get possession of Algeria or Morocco by any peaceful means of self-determination of the people. Certainly the 12 Greek islands, called the Dedocanese, which are now under Italian subjection, or suzerainty, or sovereignty, would not determine their own course and fate in that way. They speak Greek, and do not speak Italian, and want to be a part of Greece.

However, they being part of the territory of a recent enemy, might have the League of Nations deal with them, because conquest carries with it the right to dismember. But we have carried on no war of conquest against Italy, our late associate, that would enable us to deal with Tunis, let us say.

We might contend that the Dedocanese were a part of the Turkish Empire, and therefore we deal with them. Certainly no one is going to advocate here that we should give the right of self-determination to Algeria or to Morocco, and yet they were taken by conquest, as everybody knows, and as most parts of the world were originally taken under the Government of which they are now a part.

I did not hear anything about the sacredness of the right of self-determination in the sixties. Virginia wanted to determine a little question for herself and so did Mississippi, but, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said this morning, if we wanted to make that self-determination even now, or if Massachusetts or Iowa wanted to make it, the balance of the Union would whip them back into the Union. It is a pity that our forefathers down South did not call it self-determination instead of secession. I suppose if they had, then they would have had a vote of confidence from the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. The Democratic Party has made some progress since that time, and that which it used to call secession is now called self-determination.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be, and perhaps also a great many Senators upon the other side who are talking about Ireland's right of self-determination, knowing that it means Ireland's right to secession, have also made some progress. In fact, the whole world progresses now and then.

Ireland may have the best right in the world to independence, Korea may have it, Morocco may have it, British India may have it, the Philippines may have it, but none of these questions constitutes any part of the mission of a League of Nations, which is international in its character and deals only with independent existing sovereignties. That is the point. That is why I voted against the other resolution the other time, the date of which I have forgotten.

This very league itself forbids interference with the internal and domestic affairs of any members of the league by confining its provisions to "external aggression." Of course, every Senator knows that if he declares in favor of the independence of Korea, Japan will vote not to admit us to the League of Nations. He will remember that we have not entered as a charter member and must now be admitted, if at all, by a vote of the present parties to the compact.

Every Senator knows that if we declare in favor of the independence of Ireland Great Britain will vote against our admission to the League of Nations. Every Senator knows that if England were out to-day and we were in, and England, in the House of Commons or House of Lords, or both, should pass a resolution affirming the right of the Filipinos to independence and calling upon us for their self-determination and saying that after their self-determination was achieved they should become members of the League of Nations, that we would indignantly refuse to admit Great Britain to the league. I rather agree with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] that there is more politics than anything else in a good deal of this sort of thing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am going to vote for this reservation for one reason and one reason only. I do not think the reservation will have any effect whatever of securing for either one of these countries the right of self-government, but it is the recognition on the part of the Senate of the United States, in the closing hours of this long contest, of the principle which the United States has ever advocated itself, and that is that subject peoples have a right in some way to secure their independence. It is simply a general recogniton of that great principle, against which I am not willing to record my vote. Of course, so far as securing anything for Ireland is concerned, it does not purport to secure anything for Ireland. Ireland has been struggling for 700 years for her independence. The language of the reservation is:

And declares that when self-government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand—

Remember what St. Paul said about hope—it should be promptly admitted as a member to the League of Nations.

That is, when Ireland secures her independence, that she may be admitted to another combination or league which is almost as bad as the one of which she is now a member. When she secures it, after 700 years of struggle! This resolution is too weak to suit me.

Of course, Ireland is not going to get any benefit out of this resolution, but it is a recognition upon the part of the Senate of the principle of self-determination which, while it may have its exceptions, as a general principle I am not willing to vote against.

Mr. President, we are about to enter this league or not, but if we should enter it we are entering a league which has control over about 900,000,000 subject peoples, and I stand here about the last time that I propose to, to remind you of the fact, how and where is the machinery of this league by which a single one of these subject peoples can legally or in an orderly way ever secure their independence? Remember that the great Republic of the West, which has led in the fight for independence and for self-government for 150 years, now is about to put its stamp of approval, we may say, upon a machinery of international control and in that machinery there is no possible tribunal to be constructed by which the subject peoples can have a voice. Where is it? Here are Persia and Korea and Morocco and Ireland and now Shantung, and pretty soon all of China, if Japan has her way, and all these subject peoples are doomed to be subject peoples for all time, in so far as any legal machinery is concerned by which they can secure a hearing before a tribunal that can give them their independence.

In order to test this fact I amused myself last evening by writing a reservation and then wondering how it would look if it was written into the league and what kind of a league it would be after it was written in. But if it were written in it would open the door out of which the subject peoples could pass from bondage into absolute freedom, and if the faith which has been announced so often during the last 18 months is a faith in fact, if we believe in it, those who want this league and who are going to vote for it will have a suggestion here which I think will be of some value to them:

The United States construes Part I of the treaty of peace with Germany, known as the covenant of the League of Nations, to the effect that the right of self-determination as herein provided shall never be denied to any people. That whenever one-third of the adult population of a defined territory or country, the people of which have at any time enjoyed the right of self-government, shall petition in writing for their independence and the right to set up and enjoy their own form of government, it shall be the duty of the council of the league to provide, as soon as practicable and not later than six months after the presentation of said petition, for a plebiscite. The vote shall be taken on two alternatives.

(a) The maintenance of the established rule or form of government.

(b) Independence.

All persons without distinction of sex more than 21 years old at the date of voting and residents of the territory or country for one year prior to the plebiscite shall have the right to vote. The method and date of voting shall be fixed by the council of the league in such way as to secure the freedom, secrecy, and trustworthiness of the voting.

In case 60 per cent of the votes cast shall be in favor of independence, the said people shall be accorded their independence and the right to set up and maintain and enjoy their own form of government, and in case they so choose to become members of the league.

In all proceedings relative to carrying out this principle of self-determination a majority of the council shall control.

I do not offer this, for after canvassing the situation I find very few who favor it. They look upon it as wholly destructive of the league as built, and of course they are right. But, Mr. President, to those who believe in self-determination, those who believe that this league means the establishment of democracy throughout the world—and democracy means self-government—here is the door by which you can let these people out of their serfdom into independent government. But if it were adopted it would transform the entire league into a league of people, a democratic league instead of an autocratic power, depending upon force for the purpose of holding in subjection 900,000,000 of people.

If you wish to take the Irish question out of politics, if you wish to afford a remedy for all, adopt the general principle so that they may have a legal method, without revolution, of securing their independence. As it is now there is just one way for them to secure it, and that is to fight for it as Syria is doing, as Persia is doing, as India is doing, as Ireland is doing, as Korea is doing.

One other thing I may say. No one will ever charge the Irish race with being wanting in sympathy for other people who are unfortunate. In my judgment they would sympathize with the conditions of the people of Korea just as quickly as they would with the oppressed condition of other people, and if they had the right to say so they would provide a method by which all subject people could secure their independence and their freedom.

So, Mr. President, while I recognize, of course, that this will not secure anything in its weak terms for these people, I am not willing to vote against the principle that every people, every nationality now deprived of their independence and freedom, have the right to aspire to independence and freedom, and have the right to expect the sympathy of the great Republic of the West.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have listened to this discussion with great interest. I remember a brilliant critic once remarked that Paradise Lost was a poem which everybody admires and nobody reads. I have sometimes thought that the right of self-determination is a principle which everybody praises and nobody practices. Pretty much everybody is in favor of the principle of self-determination—"with reservations." Well-nigh everybody believes that in the abstract the principle of self-determination ought to be sacred, that the principle of self-determination ought to be held inviolate. Almost everybody believes that the principle of self-determination ought to be universal, except when applied to Ireland, and to Egypt, and to South Africa, and to India, and to Korea, and to Shantung; and except when applied as Prentiss would say, to those "bright, warm isles which gem the oriental seas and are kissed by the fiery sun of the Tropics," which, for reasons too delicate to mention, I shall not mention.

Mr. President, is there such a thing as the principle of self-determination? If so, when should the principle apply? If so, where should the principle apply? Should that principle apply to the relationship between Ireland and England, under which there have been seven centuries of English tyranny and seven centuries of Irish agony? Mr. President, in the last general election in Ireland there were more than 1,200,000 votes cast in favor of Irish independence. If love of liberty be a qualification for liberty, the Irish are not disqualified. In the last general election in Ireland 24 of the 32 counties in Ireland returned to the British Parliament a unanimous delegation in favor of Irish independence. Twenty-seven counties out of 32 in Ireland either returned a unanimous delegation or returned a majority of republicans to Parliament. Not one county in Ireland returned a solid unionist delegation to the Parliament. Of the 101 members of Parliament chosen in Ireland in that election, 72 are avowed champions of Irish independence; and, Mr. President, the more is the pity, of those 72 Irish republicans returned to Parliament, 68 are either in jail this day or they have done service "in durance vile" during the recent agitations in Ireland. Only 26 were out of prison at the time they were chosen to Parliament. Under the dominion of free and glorious England, 68 Irish members of the British Parliament have been incarcerated as political prisoners.

The first woman chosen to Parliament was not Lady Astor, of American birth; she was a woman of Irish birth, and she was elected to Parliament while she was confined in prison—English liberty versus Irish chivalry.

When and where should the principle of self-determination apply? But yesterday I saw an account of a visit by the lord mayor of London to the Mountjoy Prison, where 44 political prisoners were wearing their chains in their dungeons.

Is this for politics alone? I can not say. I can not search the hearts of men. I try always to ascribe the conduct of men to the best motives which the circumstances will justify. It may be that sympathy for the oppressed has burned out in the American heart and that only the embers smolder where once the flame of liberty burned, as we thought, with unquenchable flame. When the great Webster introduced a resolution expressing sympathy with the struggling Greeks—struggling to cast off the yoke of Turkish tyranny and resume the liberties which they had lost 2,000 years before—it may be that the great Webster was mocking a sacred sentiment. It may be that he had no love of liberty in his heart; it may have been a cheap appeal to the Greeks residing upon the back alleys in Boston. I would rather think that he was animated by that love of liberty which characterized and distinguished his immortal career.

When Henry Clay offered his resolution expressing sympathy with the struggling peoples of South America, it may have been a cheap appeal, it may have been the appeal of the demagogue, to the Latin Americans residing in Lexington. I would rather believe it was a passion for freedom, which has glorified his name in the annals of those who have been lovers of liberty. A great orator said of Clay that his fame had built for itself a nest by the side of the eagle's, not only in the isles of Greece but upon the summits of the Andes. That orator was mistaken; "Harry of the West" was playing cheap politics, catering to the Latin vote in the outlying precincts of Louisville.

Perhaps when the American people shed their blood and spent their treasure to liberate the island of Cuba from Spanish thralldom—perhaps they were merely exploiting a sentiment which they did not feel—were merely playing a part to regale the astonished eyes of a wondering world.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the Democratic and Republican platforms of 1892. The places are marked, and I ask that the passages be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

SYMPATHY FOR THE OPPRESSED.

SEC. 11. This country has always been the refuge of the oppressed from every land—exiles for conscience' sake—and, in the spirit of the founders of our Government, we condemn the oppression practiced by the Russian Government upon its Lutheran and Jewish subjects, and we call upon our National Government, in the interest of justice and humanity, by all just and proper means, to use its prompt and best efforts to bring about a cessation of these cruel persecutions in the dominions of the Czar, and to secure to the oppressed equal rights.

We tender our profound and earnest sympathy to those lovers of freedom who are struggling for home rule and the great cause of local self-government in Ireland.

Mr. GORE. Which party platform was that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is from the Democratic platform.

Mr. GORE. They are so much alike it is difficult to distinguish between them.

The Assistant Secretary read from the Republican platform of 1892, as follows:

CHAMPIONING THE OPPRESSED.

The Republican Party has always been the champion of the oppressed and recognizes the dignity of manhood, irrespective of faith, color, or nationality. It sympathizes with the cause of home rule in Ireland, and protests against the persecution of the Jews in Russia.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there are, indeed, those who confess judgment and who declare that these lofty appeals in behalf of the struggling peoples of Ireland and of Russia were mere vain protestations, bids for the Irish and the Russian vote, casting diamond dust in their eyes, and that these splendid sentiments were not inspired by that love of liberty which more than all other sentiments has distinguished the history of this Republic. The Democrats and the Republicans in 1892 reiterated a declaration in behalf of the oppressed people of Ireland. Will they now keep the faith? I still feel a sympathy in their age-long aspirations for liberty and for independence.

Mr. President, the Irish have earned a better fate. In every cabinet where talent can win its way will be found the resplendent genius of Irish statesmanship; in every forum where liberty is allowed to plead her own cause has been heard the voice of Irish eloquence; upon every field of battle where men have died for freedom will be found the graves of Irish heroes. The Irish contributed their part to the liberty and independence of America; the Irish contributed their part to maintain this matchless Union, which is the fairest ark of liberty that has ever sailed the seas of time. Mr. President, upon every battle field of liberty the devoted sons of Erin have held their rendezvous with death. When did it come to be a proof of demagogy to express a sympathy in behalf of Irish liberation and in behalf of Irish independence?

I hope that Great Britain may yet see her way to unrivet the chains upon the limbs of Ireland. As a friend of Irish freedom, I would rather see England strike off those bonds than to see those bonds burst asunder by a revolution, by butchery, and by bloodshed; but, Mr. President, I hope that the sunburst of Irish freedom is even now flushing to the dawn. I hope that the time may yet come when the dying prayer of Robert Emmet may find its answer; I hope that the time may yet come when Robert Emmet's epitaph may be inscribed upon his tomb; I hope that the time may yet come when Ireland may, in accordance with Emmet's prayer, take her appointed place among the free nations of the earth.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, while I am in cordial sympathy with the reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], still I look with many misgivings upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to strike out the line which says that the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination.

There is no question but that nothing more reactionary could be proposed—and I was surprised that it should have come from the State of Massachusetts—than to strike out the declaration which seems to be the common law of the world to-day, the principle of self-determination. It is the very principle which gave us our national existence, and even Englishmen were the severest critics of those who stood in the way. Lord Chatham, you will recall, said if he were an American as he was an Englishman, so long as a British troop remained in this country never would he lay down his arms. The principle of self-determination has been ingrained in the Anglo-Saxon race, so called, and it is only a matter of time and method when it shall be given to Ireland; and here the Senate of the United States contemplates striking out from a reservation a matter of such common acceptance as the principle of self-determination.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think that the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination?

Mr. PHELAN. The policy of the United States recognizes that principle, I believe, in most of its public acts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator agree to that principle being recognized in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator agrees that the Hawaiian Islands by their own self-determination joined the United States. I do not see why the question should be raised, as there is no question of that kind, that Hawaii wishes to withdraw from the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Might it not be raised in the future?

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator will anticipate all questions and expect a categorical answer, he will keep me very busy; but the Hawaiian Islands are a Territory of the United States, which is to all intents and purposes the fullest expression under our law of self-determination. Hawaii has the protection of the United States by land and sea and she has the right to pass domestic legislation. What more could she want?

Mr. WADSWORTH. She might want independence.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, if she asks for it, we will consider it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no further questions to ask.

Mr. PHELAN. And if we deny independence to the Hawaiian Islands when Hawaii makes application for it on just grounds—that our law is oppressive and inimical to her interests; that it is destructive of her native population and against the welfare and well-being of the people—I do not see how the United States could hesitate to cure the situation. She would give them such a measure of independence, perhaps, as the United States voluntarily gave Cuba, holding under the Platt amendment that in case there was disorder or civil war, or perhaps external aggression menacing our coasts, we would intervene, but that during those days of peace and quiet Hawaii would enjoy the same independence under such circumstances as Cuba now enjoys; and we do not begrudge to Cuba that independence. She is as much a part of the United States as though she were a Territory of the United States for all legitimate and defensive purposes.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. WADSWORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Since the Senator has explained so luminously the doctrine of self-determination as applied to Hawaii, I wish he would explain to us on what doctrine of self-determination we fought the South for four years.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the United States is one country, and the men of the South were as much a part of the American people as the men of the North. Unlike Ireland, they came into the Union of their own motion, and they claimed that under the Constitution, as they interpreted it, they could go out of their own motion. That was disputed. So it became not a revolution but a rebellion, and it was one of those things that had to be settled by the arbitrament of the sword. It was the moral issue of slavery. There was no other tribunal to which appeal could be made; but I do not think there is any parallel between the principle of self-determination as applied to a great section of the country, as to the South or the East or the West, and as applied to countries that have a nationality and a history and traditions of their own, that are racially different, as in the case of Ireland and England. There can be no possible parallel. In America we are a homogeneous family, and if we have a family quarrel, that is our own affair. The Supreme Court has held this is "an indestructible Union of indestructible States."

Mr. LODGE and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his explanation. It is quite perfect.

Mr. PHELAN. I am glad that the Senator accepts it.

Mr. LODGE. I see now that the South did not want to go; that it had no racial or traditional history; that it did not have within its borders the oldest colony; and that it had self-determination, though it cost us four years of savage war to prevent its having self-determination.

Mr. PHELAN. But the Senator does not pretend to say that there is any parallel between the relations between the North and the South and the relations between England and Ireland?

Mr. LODGE. It is not a question of parallel. Either the self-determination is always applicable or it is only sometimes applicable, when we happen to feel like it.

Mr. PHELAN. I am referring now to the self-determination of nations. The United States self-determined, not by decree but by the arbitrament of the sword, in that instance. It is now recognized as the accepted verdict beyond recall.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from California that he has in support of his argument generally the very important fact that at the time of the Civil War the necessity of the States of the Union being cohered together in the Union was a vital question, affecting the protection of the whole of the American Continent; that if the States at that time had been divided, and the Union destroyed, they would have been open to the attack of the military dynasties of Europe, and therefore the intuition of the American people was against such a separation. That matter is no longer of force, because the nations of the world are now democratic; the nations of the world have recognized that government ought to be based upon the consent of the governed; so that the premises are changed, and the Senator from California may well take that into account.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I enjoy what the Senator has said, but he has encroached upon my time.

I merely desire to emphasize the fact that this Government has steadfastly maintained from its very inception the principle of self-determination. It is, in fact, that very principle that gave it its birth; and if, even by implication, there is a repudiation here to-day of that principle, I think it is a matter of such a serious character that it should be understood.

The President went to Paris armed with an article to be inserted in the covenant of the league in which this principle was put in a most practical form. The words are as follows:

> The contracting powers unite in guaranteeing to each other political independence and territorial integrity, but it is understood between them that such territorial readjustment, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations or present social and political relationships, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may, in the judgment of three-fourths of the delegates, be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the peoples concerned, may be effected if agreeable to those peoples, and that territorial changes may in equity involve material compensation. The contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PHELAN. I would rather save my time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I just want to ask the Senator if that is still in the treaty?

Mr. PHELAN. Will the Senator allow me to conclude? Then I will answer.

The President brought that to Paris. It was an American doctrine, and it is unfortunate, in my judgment, that it is not embodied in the treaty and in the covenant of the league; but it will be proposed here before we get through with these reservations, and the Senate will have an opportunity of reasserting this American doctrine. I proposed here in November that the 14 points, embodying self-determination as their cardinal feature, should be inserted in the treaty as a means by which its provisions could be interpreted; and that, unfortunately, I must admit, was voted down. I see, therefore, in this body as at present organized a reactionary trend, but it is not too late to set ourselves right in the light of history and in the political arena of the world, and retrogression now might be very serious to free nations that rely upon and look to us, at any rate, for our moral support.

There was put into the RECORD yesterday a letter from Mr. Hoover, which indicated that we might properly keep out of certain commissions that are organized in Europe to carry out the provisions of the treaty of peace. In California on October 2, 1919, he made a statement before the Stanford University. That was several months after he had delivered to the President in Paris the memorandum dated April, 1919. I quote him now as of October, 1919. He says, among other things:

We have been the center and inspiration of democracy for a hundred years. We have given our sympathy and encouragement to every aspiration for self-government in all this time. We have, from our experience in its blessings, believed it made for peace and well-being. We enjoy from it the highest standard of living in the world. We went to Europe with our best blood and our treasure, and fought the attempt to impose autocracy on the world. We won. We imposed democracy all over Europe. We set up a score of new democracies, and there are in many of them peoples of our own blood, in the Baltic, Polish, and Slav races. Are we to refuse our counsels to those peoples now struggling to realize—

What? He says—

Our own ideals.

Our greatest ideal is the ideal which we have always possessed, the right of self-government. It is the inspiration of our political life, and we have gone abroad, and according to the President and according to Mr. Hoover—a political leader of the first magnitude, I judge, from the way his words are received—we have given it to Europe, and here in the Senate it is proposed to obliterate it from the record, to strike it out, which can not but put us in a position of saying that after a hundred and fifty years our ideal is of no value; that we have been simply indulging in a pretense and a deception when we invited the peoples of the world to adopt democracy, which is self-determination, and promised to give them our support.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator's attention to article 80 of the treaty, which provides that—

Germany acknowledges and will respect strictly the independence of Austria within the frontiers which may be fixed in a treaty between that State and the principal allied and associated powers; she agrees that this independence shall be inalienable, except with the consent of the council of the League of Nations.

Is that self-determination?

Mr. PHELAN. She agrees that the independence shall be inalienable?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Except with the council's consent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me remind the Senator that not long ago the Austrian people showed their disposition to join with Germany and were forbidden to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. I will answer the question in the time of the Senator from New York, if he desires.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask the question in my own time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My purpose is not to split hairs, but the expression "the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination" is something that should mean something, and if we do adhere to it let us know that we do. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, we do not adhere to it, and there have been several occasions in our history when we have not adhered to it.

One reason why I would like to see this stricken out of the reservation is that the United States should not say something in a reservation and then go back upon that assertion in the years to come. The Senator from California has insisted that this language should stay in the reservation. I put to him certain questions about Hawaii. I did not get a very direct answer. My recollection of history may be somewhat inaccurate, but I can not remember that the people of Hawaii expressed their consent to become a part of or one of the Territorial possessions of the United States. Nor do I believe that the Senator from California would be willing to permit the persons living in Hawaii to-day to express themselves as to what kind of a government they desire and under what government they prefer to live. We might just as well confess it; we would not permit it, for the very reason that it would threaten the security of the people of the United States.

The thing I have been begging for, Mr. President, during all this discussion is that whatever the Senate declares it declare honestly. The Senator knows just as well as I do that the United States intends to continue governing Hawaii as a Territorial possession of this country. The Senator knows that we intend to continue our jurisdiction over the Panama Canal Zone, just as we are doing to-day. The Senator knows that we would not give serious consideration to a plebiscite in the Virgin Islands on the question whether they shall be independent or a territory of the United States.

What is the use of using language in a reservation of this sort which we do not mean? Why this hypocrisy? That is all it is. I am endeavoring to apply the lesson to our own situation. I am making no reference to the other nations and their troubles and difficulties. My plea is that this language be taken out of this reservation; for if it is not taken out, and we vote it in, we are voting in something that we do not mean to abide by.

Mr. WOLCOTT and Mr. PHELAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to ask the Senator if it is not true that a principle of self-determination, whether the same has been previously expressed by us or not, supplies the only possible justification for the reservation with respect to Ireland? Upon what other basis can the reservation find support?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the thing that I object to about this particular language is that it is a blanket declaration, applicable to every situation of the kind that may arise all over the world, including situations affecting us.

I have a very much different conception, indeed, of the Irish situation from what I have of the Virgin Islands situation. I have a very different conception of the Irish situation from what I have of the Moroccan situation. Surely no Senator would put them all in the same class, and adopt a reservation to be inserted in a great treaty binding the United States, morally at least, to view all these situations as in exactly the same category. The provision under consideration is a blanket provision. We are asked to declare that the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination. My question is, do we adhere to it? I doubt it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator asked me, and I presume I am free to answer him, concerning the situation in Hawaii. Hawaii, I stated, was a part of the American Government, now enjoying a territorial form of organization, and it is merely raising an idle question when the Senator asks whether I would consent should it be the determination of the Hawaiian Islands to leave the United States and set up a government of their own.

The conditions in the Hawaiian Islands are extraordinary, because the native population is diminishing, and the white population is not increasing, while an alien, the Japanese, population, now equaling one-half of the whole population, is, by reason of immigration and by the birth rate, increasing with great rapidity. So I do not know whether the Senator had that in mind when he asked whether, if the people "resident in the islands" declared for self-determination, we would accord it. Of course we would not accord it, if it was the vote of an alien population. But they are residents of the island, and this principle of self-determination, like every principle, when reduced to practice, must be viewed in the light of existing conditions.

As a general proposition, yes; the people have a right to declare their form of government, and no other country is good enough to govern a people against their will. That is cardinal Americanism. In the early days of New York, which was the hotbed of Toryism, there was a very large party in the Senator's State opposed to American independence. Now, if the Senator believes that this principle of self-determination is erroneous or is prejudicial to the interests of the world, I wonder what his position would have been when it came up to a question whether the colonies should self-determine, or whether they should make terms with England?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator ask me that question?

Mr. PHELAN. I would like to have the Senator's view, because in applying his principles to our own conditions in revolutionary days I think he would be in doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from California is proceeding in violation of the rule.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I understood that I was talking in the time of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has no authority to talk in the time of the Senator from New York under the view held by the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the phrase "the principle of self-determination," as applied to parts of people connected with a government, may be theoretically idealistic; practically it is utterly impossible. It is true the President carried to the council at Paris article 10 with that kind of a provision in it, and I am going to call attention to it once more, and also to his first modification of his idealistic provision, because I wish Senators and the public generally to grasp the extent to which he yielded ideals before article 10 was finally adopted at Paris. It is not unreasonable, I insist, that as he yielded and permitted stricken the real heart of his original article 10, at the instance of the council in Paris, he should now be willing to yield to the view of the Senate when we take out the obligation to put our boys into the wars of the world to sustain the governments with their 600,000,000 of subject peoples. Let me read his article 10 as it was first written:

The contracting powers unite in guaranteeing to each other political independence and territorial integrity—

This is the provision for force. Now I will read the heart, the real human sympathy, that he presented. His original article 10 continues—but it is understood between them that such territorial readjustments, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations or present social and political relationships, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may, in the judgment of three-fourths of the delegates, be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the peoples concerned, may be effected if agreeable to those peoples, and that territorial changes may in equity involve material compensation. The contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.

Mr. President, the heart of his article 10 began with the word "but." It was a provision for self-determination. It was a provision that the representatives in the council, by a three-fourths vote, might require, if the subject peoples desired it, that liberty should be given to them. It was a provision to free the 600,000,000 of subject peoples held by Great Britain, by France, and by Japan.

What happened to this provision, this heart of his article 10? I turn to the second time we find it in the partially revised draft, when the President began to yield, when he began to make concessions to the council at Paris, and his first great concession was, instead of leaving the power of the council by a three-fourths vote, to give freedom to these subject peoples, if the people desired it, he added—and this was in the President's handwriting, on the copy furnished to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

If agreeable to the State from which the territory is separated.

His first qualification, at the instance of the council, was that this privilege of giving freedom to the subject peoples as the result of the acts of three-fourths of the council could only proceed if consented to by the rulers of the subject peoples.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. REED. Would they not have that right any way, at any time, without anybody's interference?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not aware of any reason why they could not have had it. But the council would not have had authority to interfere except for the provision. Still the provision would have been that the council might investigate the question, that the council might consider the status of subject peoples, and if three-fourths of the council thought that a subject people should be given their liberties if the Government over them would consent.

There was left the principle of self-determination limited to the consent of the governing power.

Now, that was the second shape in which we find this heart of article 10. Let me repeat, it was the heart, and the only heart, in article 10. What happened at the council? Every line of it was stricken, and what they finally left was the obligation upon members of the league to maintain existing Governments and existing territorial boundaries. They struck out the privilege of self-determination; they struck out the right of the council to consider the status of subject people, and left the provision that each member of the league must help the governing power, if there was an outsider interfered, to keep these peoples subject peoples.

I submit to Senators that the President is mistaken in his present suggestion that he could not look in the face the soldiers who fought in France if we interfere with the present article 10. If they were led to believe they were fighting to make the world safe for democracy, what about these 600,000,000 subject people? They were part of the world. The statement has not been limited to making the people of Europe free for democracy or the Provinces governed by Germany and Austria free for democracy. We are told the soldiers fought to make the world free for democracy, and the President had that in his mind and in his heart when he put his original article 10 before the council; but when the council struck every line that bore upon the rights of subject peoples, 600,000,000 and more in number, they took out the heart, and the time for the President to have been disturbed about looking our soldiers in the face was when he agreed to have that taken out. There is nothing left in article 10 to trouble the President or anybody else about looking the soldiers in the face.

When we strike the provision in article 10 that requires us to furnish our boys to the wars of the world for the purpose of maintaining present governments and present territorial boundaries, we say to them, "We have not stricken the provision that would help keep the world free for democracy, but we have stricken the provision in article 10 which would require you to help keep 600,000,000 subject peoples." We would say to them, "We have declared, by striking out that provision of article 10, that you shall not be taken from your homes, from your mothers, from your wives, from your sisters, from your sweethearts, to go all over the world fighting in wars that your Congress has not approved. We have not placed you automatically behind the British Empire and other subject ruling nations to sustain them in their vast dimensions."

I want to stop a moment and say, while making this statement, that if Great Britain proper was really in danger from a foreign foe, I would be in favor of standing right by her and helping preserve her from attack. But that is a very different proposition from helping to preserve the vast empire scattered all over the world upon which the sun never sets, with the millions of subject people in it.

The heart went out of article 10 when the council struck all of it that the President carried to Paris except the obligation to furnish our men to fight the world over as wars developed. Of course, the provision that we would respect the boundaries and the governments is all right. We do respect every government, we want no one's territory. We desire peace; we wish to be let alone ourselves; we want to interfere with no one else. But when it comes to putting our boys into the wars of the world under the obligation of article 10, I vote to strike out the obligation, with intense conviction that article 10 is indefensible, and I can look the mothers and the wives and the sisters in the face and say, "Yes; I took the steel and the blood out of article 10. I helped to save your families, those dearest to you, from the wars of the world, unless your Congress in the particular instance, believing that war just, believing the cause right, decides we were called upon to make the sacrifice; but your boys shall not automatically go without reference to the justice of the cause, passed upon in each case by your representatives in Congress responding to the wishes of the people of this country." I shall vote against this reservation. We can not prescribe for the citizens of other countries "the principle of self-determination." To add this reservation is a serious blow to the treaty. It will increase the difficulty of securing ratification of the treaty. It has no real connection with the treaty, and I trust it will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I move that the reservation offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] be laid on the table.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. GERRY. I was requested to announce the absence, on official business of the Senate, of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question recurs on the motion made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that the reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] lie on the table.

Mr. REED. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Announcing the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that upon this motion my absent pair, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and myself are in accord. I am therefore at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am not at liberty to vote because of my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of sickness. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 51, as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay Mr. GERRY's reservation on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I announce the same pair as on the previous roll call and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of my pair, I must withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I must withhold my vote for the reason mentioned on the last roll call. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence, and because of my inability to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I ask if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has voted.

Mr. OWEN. I vote "nay"; but if I thought there was any chance of the amendment being agreed to, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 46, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the reservation of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I said I should propose, to strike out the words "the principle of self-determination and," in lines 2 and 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On lines 2 and 3 of the printed amendment it is proposed to strike out the words "the principle of self-determination and," so that it will read:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany, the United States adheres to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people—

And so forth.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, upon which the yeas and nays are requested. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair and being unable to get a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. If voting, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). On account of the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I must withhold my vote for the reasons stated on the roll call next to the last. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Having a general pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 42, as follows:

So Mr. LODGE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall not ask for a vote on the other two trifling amendments that I proposed to offer. I am not myself ready to vote for a reservation in which the United States gives its adherence to the principle of self-determination, which is not in the treaty in any form. Moreover, self-determination put in as a general principle involves the United States in every possible claim for self-determination all over the world, whether a good claim or a bad one.

I made an effort to detach the question of Ireland from all the other questions in the world, so that we could get a vote upon it, in the hope that we might adopt a reservation favorable to Ireland and expressing our sympathy with her efforts and desires for self-government. The Senate having kept that language in and making this a general declaration, has made it impossible for me to vote for it, desiring as I do to ratify the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had been adopted, I should have been glad to support this reservation; but it seems to me that Senators should be very careful, and in their sympathy for Ireland they ought not to forget the interests of the United States, which they are doing if this reservation be adopted in the form in which it is now proposed.

I had supposed that the doctrine of secession had been settled after four long years of civil war, and that it never would be raised again; but with the language "adhering to the principle of self-determination" we in the Senate would declare a policy to the Hawaiian Islands, to the Philippine Islands, to Porto Rico, to Alaska, aye, to each State of this Union, that whenever the time shall come when the people of those possessions or the people of any State shall desire to separate themselves from this Union we pledge ourselves that they shall be at liberty to do so.

Is it possible that the Senate of the United States this afternoon is going to announce any such policy as that? While I do not for a moment question the good faith of most of those who are pressing the reservation in this form, because the entire Senate is in sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people, I do say that many upon the other side of the aisle, in the position they are now taking, are not sincere in really desiring by the action of the Senate upon this treaty to help the people of Ireland. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the leader of the minority, is entirely willing to express by resolution his sympathy with the desire of the people of Ireland for self-government; but, at the same time, he insists that we shall assume all of the obligations imposed by article 10 of this covenant, and he insists that the reservation that we have adopted relieving us from those obligations nullifies the treaty; and in doing that, of course, he is only following his master. But, with that position that the Senator from Nebraska takes, while he is willing to extend a resolution of sympathy to the people of Ireland, if in time to come the people of Ireland shall rebel and any other nation shall attempt to help them to gain their liberty, he insists that the boys of the United States and the money of the United States and the resources of the United States shall be used without stint, not to help the Irish people for freedom but to help Great Britain to continue the Irish people in subjection. That is the position which the Senator from Nebraska takes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it is not always easy to assert in a phrase an incontrovertible proposition as to government and its powers. I do not suppose there was ever a single phrase used in the attempt to do that which was entirely accurate. When our fathers declared their independence they stated that—

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Mr. President, I favor the self-determination of peoples and races. When I say that I do not mean, and I do not think anybody could fairly intend that a person should mean, that every little aggregation of people should be free and independent. It must be construed in connection with the facts in the case as to whether a nation is capable of governing itself and whether it can maintain its government and its independence. I see no objection to asserting the right of a race or a nation to govern itself, to determine its own destiny, any more than I would hesitate to assert, just as the fathers did who formed the Declaration of Independence, the right of revolution. Our Government is not only founded upon the right of revolution, but upon an accomplished, successful revolution, and the mere fact that this asserts in broad terms the right of self-determination does not deter me from voting to adhere to the resolutions which I voted for, as adopted by the Senate, declaring my sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people to have a government of their own choice.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, some days ago I offered a reservation in behalf of Irish independence that meant something; that had teeth in it; that had red blood in it; but the Senator from Minnesota, prompted by the Senator from Florida, moved to lay it upon the table, which was done, and thus a free expression of the opinion of the Senate was prevented upon the direct question, which I deeply regret and deplore.

The reservation under consideration practically expresses nothing but sympathy. It is almost colorless. The Irish nation have had sympathy enough. What they want is action. They want help for freedom and independence, something with substance in it. I am going to support the reservation as the best expression of the American Senate in favor of ultimate Irish independence that can be obtained at this time.

However, there is one word in it that is of doubtful meaning, in view of the peculiar organization of the Government of the British Empire. It has been contended here that a number of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain are self-governing; and they are, largely, in local affairs. But in the control of foreign affairs they are not, Great Britain controlling all the foreign affairs of those colonies, under the prerogative of the Crown, never granted to the several colonies.

There should be no doubt about this matter. Ireland wants not local self-government but independence. Therefore I move to strike out the word "self-government" and insert the word "independence."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On line 6 of the printed amendment it is proposed to strike out the word "self-government" and insert in lieu thereof the word "independence," so it will read:

> And declares that when independence is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, before this vote is taken I should like to call attention to the fact that there are some people in America more interested in the principle involved here than in the embarrassment of any man or any party; that there are many people in America who honestly and sincerely believe in the principle expressed in this reservation. After hearing the eloquent speech of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] this afternoon, we should, if we have any of the true American spirit left, hesitate to treat lightly or trifle with a cause in which so many Americans are keenly and sincerely interested.

After the story related by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the story of the 68 duly elected members of the British Parliament from Ireland who have been or are to-day in jail because of their efforts for a free republic, the people in America who sympathize with the cause of the Irish race are not going to forget the men who kill—if it is defeated—this reservation through political intrigue or through parliamentary tactics. I repeat, this question, which is most dear to the hearts of subject people, ought not to be treated here lightly. It is a solemn, a serious, a holy cause with them.

> Of all the griefs that harass the distrest
> Sure the most bitter is a scornful jest.

We ought to courageously and willingly support this reservation, because the adoption of this covenant in its present form will unquestionably lessen the chance for subject races to obtain their liberty. Nine hundred millions of subject people will be debarred by this covenant from ever having their right to independence judicially determined by an international court. Nine hundred millions of them were denied by article 10 of this covenant as finally agreed upon in Versailles from ever getting outside assistance and aid.

I hold in my hand a letter which came this morning from President Lowell, of Harvard University, a man who has given as much intellectual thought and study to the covenant of the League of Nations as any man in America, a man who from the very beginning of the discussion of this question has been, until very recently, for the unqualified approval and ratification of this treaty.

Now, let us see what he says about article 10:

In addition to what I wrote you the other day the following has occurred to me about article 10:

Suppose there were a revolt by some people against the dominance of the government of another race; suppose the revolutionaries were assisted to obtain their independence by some other nation, as we were at the time of the American Revolution. Would this be a foreign aggression such that we should be pledged by article 10 to intervene and restore the people who had so achieved independence to the control of their former rulers? This is no imaginary condition. Suppose Korea revolted and was assisted by China or Russia in maintaining her independence. Should we be pledged to restore the Koreans to Japanese rule? The same question may occur in many other places in Europe and elsewhere; and it may be at any time an actual one.

The substitute proposed by Senator LODGE for his previous reservation on article 10 seems to me to deserve the same support as the original.

Substitute in this letter of President Lowell's the word Ireland or Egypt for Korea and Great Britain for Japan, and you can understand very clearly how the adoption of article 10 without a reservation removing our obligation will remove all possible outside aid to the Irish or Egyptian people and obligate the United States to restore the Irish or Egyptian race to England if they obtain their independence from the British Government.

I refer to this letter because every Senator in this Chamber who voted for article 10 without reservations voted to deprive subject races forever of the opportunity of outside aid and assistance.

If the United States assumes the obligation under article 10, the United States will become an accomplice to the destruction of the means heretofore possessed and employed by subject people to get their liberty.

Nine hundred millions of human beings have had the door of opportunity for obtaining their freedom closed to them. To me the very worst offense committed against peace and humanity at the peace conference; the most serious offense of all that happened there; the thing that has really broken the hearts of the peoples of the world, is that 900,000,000 people were provided with no means of ever going to the League of Nations or an international court for a hearing to determine their right to set up an independent government.

The right of petition has been denied them; and, worse than that, an effort was successfully made to combine the dominant races and nations of the world to hold them in everlasting subjection.

What of our ideals! What did we fight for! Consider what history will say! Are our sacrifices for high ideals to result in placing the shackles tighter than ever upon the subject races? Do you wonder that representatives and friends of these people—Koreans, Egyptians, Irish, and all other subject races—are aroused, and that they look with fear and the deepest concern upon the establishment on the face of the earth of a combination of the nations of the world which will deny them the right of petition, the right of hearing, and unite against them if they attempt by force to assert their independence?

Mr. President, I am not going to take up any more time developing that thought. I only suggest it for this purpose: To impress upon the Senators in this Chamber that there are millions of Americans who know these facts; that there are millions of Americans who do not want this cause, when the Senate is asked to speak in terms of sympathy for these subject races, to be trifled with, to be played with, to be a matter of politics, to be a matter to be favored or rejected by the employment of parliamentary tactics that indirectly lead to the injury of the cause.

I have not injected this question here, but it has been brought here, and I only ask that the Senate, speaking for the American people, say what it really believes. I ask that the Senators who voted just now to strike out the words which would have given this measure of sympathy more votes from the other side of the Chamber be consistent and vote now, 42 of them, for this reservation. If Senators who voted to strike out this language for the purpose of taking votes from this cause from the other side of the Chamber reverse their vote now, they will show that they have employed an indirect means of killing this reservation and of rejecting this expression of sympathy and support.

Insufficient though the language may be in some particulars, the reservation is yet filled with great potentiality, for an expression by the Senate of the United States of sympathy with these people who have resorted to every peaceful means possible to set up an independent government means that Great Britain will realize that the moral support of America is with the Irish cause for independence. It is notice to the world that America sympathizes with the aspirations of these people and emphatically supports the principle of self-determination.

Therefore, I am not particular about technicalities; I am not particular about exact phraseology. I am simply interested in the great principle involved. I want men to vote for or against it, according to their convictions. I do not want any intriguing. I do not want any indirect method employed to kill it. If the Senate believes an expression of sympathy for the Irish people should be incorporated in this momentous document, it is notice to the world that America looks with sympathy upon this cause. Even the mention of the issue approvingly is bound to be an influence in molding the public opinion of the world.

So, Mr. President, if I have talked passionately, it is because I want to direct your attention to the fundamental principle involved. That is what the world is interested in. Let us vote our honest convictions as to whether we think at this time in this document we ought to incorporate the sentiments of America on this question.

I have just a single further thought. We owe to the subject peoples our approval of the provisions of this reservation, because the covenant of the league does not give them any hope.

If this league refuses to receive or hear them, as it does, they know that there is only one way open to them—war, bloodshed, murder, and all the terrible consequences of war—the very thing that we have spent weeks and months deliberating upon and trying to eliminate from the face of the earth.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate to meet this issue squarely and to realize that there is a principle involved here, a principle in which the people of America are sincerely and deeply interested.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if we are to meet the Irish question, let us do it directly and consistently and not by subterfuge or deception. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is in effect that the United States adheres to "the principle of independence," taking the place of the expression "the principle of self-determination." It appears to me that is worse than the original. We can not, of course, question for one moment that the American people believe absolutely in independence. That is not open to argument or discussion. But in putting ourselves on record, in stating in no uncertain language that we adhere to the principle of independence, to say the least, we are deceiving, when we take it in connection with our policy with some of the colonial possessions of our country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator, I think for his own benefit, that he is mistaken about the suggestion which was made by the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Tennessee, if I understood him correctly, suggested not to substitute "independence" for "principle of self-determination," but in line 6 to substitute the word "independence" in lieu of the words "self-government." Am I correct, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; the Senator is correct. My motion was to strike out the word "self-government" and insert the word "independence."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is as I understood the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. I thank the Senator from Connecticut for his correction, but the principle which inspired me to speak at this moment still exists.

The Senate, by vote, has defeated the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to eliminate the words "adheres to the principle of self-determination." I understood the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to then suggest an amendment to the word "self-determination" in that case, but if not, the principle of which I am speaking still exists. We "adhere to the principle of self-determination" if we pass the resolution as it now is before the Senate.

I had the pleasure a few weeks ago to visit the Virgin Islands, one of the colonial possessions of the United States. We paid $25,000,000 for the Virgin Islands a short time ago, approximately three years ago. A commission was sent down under the authority of the Senate and House of Representatives to consider the very question as to whether we were prepared to permit the inhabitants of the Virgin Islands to determine for themselves their form of government. I can not anticipate the report of the commission. It is now in process of preparation. But I feel quite safe in the prophecy that after exhaustive hearings in the various islands, in two of the most populous islands, that the committee representing both Houses of Congress and representing both political parties will never recommend that the inhabitants of the Virgin Islands are prepared to-day to take to themselves entire self-government.

Therefore, it seems to me, if we are going to vote on the question of Ireland—and I am prepared to vote on it and I would like to see it voted on directly and not indirectly—that we should not couple with it a statement that we know perfectly well, when we consider our present relations with other colonial possessions, does not represent the policy of our country to-day.

I repeat that there is not a question in the world as to our feeling as to independence or as to final self-determination, but we must couple with that actual existing conditions. Independence? Yes; when they are prepared to be independent. Self-determination? Yes; when, through our investigations, conditions are such that they can govern themselves as well as they could with a connecting link with this country. So, if we are going to vote on Ireland, let us vote on Ireland under the conditions that we generally know exist between Ireland and the mother country, and not attempt to decide or attempt to affirmatively state a policy which in itself is absolutely deceiving so far as the existing policy of our own country is concerned.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. This is simply because those possessions are not prepared; we would not be fair to those possession, so far as I have investigated them, if we permitted them to have at this time full self-government or full independence.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Senator takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. A vote was taken a few moments ago on the amendment regarding Korea, and defeated. Have we not, therefore, set a precedent in favor of the proposition that we are now voting upon the question of Ireland only, and that consequently there can be no consequential effect either upon the people of the Virgin Islands or the people of any other country?

Mr. EDGE. I thoroughly appreciate the conclusion of the Senator from Colorado, but I do think, in answer to his question generally, that the conditions in Ireland perhaps are better understood by Members of the Senate, through research and travel and general information, than the conditions in Korea. I am entirely ready to vote favorably on the question of Ireland, if misleading statements as to the policy of the United States are eliminated from the pending reservation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. EDGE. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am curious to know why, if the Senator favors a vote on Ireland and on nothing else, he voted to table all the motions that were made to bring up that question?

Mr. EDGE. Quite consistently, because extraneous questions have regularly been included.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], which is as follows:

The United States further understands that in fulfillment and execution of the great principles of self-determination of peoples and equality of all Governments said to pervade and underlie the covenant of the League of Nations, Great Britain will forthwith recognize the existence and political independence of the Republic of Ireland, and agree that it shall become a member of the League of Nations with equal representation accorded to all other sovereign and independent Governments.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just one word with reference to the much-talked-of expression "self-determination." What has that to do with the Virgin Islands? What has it to do with the Philippine Islands?

The President used the expression "self-determination" of small nations. Again, he spoke of "self-determination" of races. By no legitimate construction can those terms be so tortured as to mean that any small group of people could get together anywhere in the world and set up a government of their own. The terms were intended to apply to racial or political divisions. They were intended to apply to cases where a nation or people had been conquered and upon whom a government had been forced against their will. The expression should be applied sensibly and reasonably. When the expressions were uttered no one understood that the doctrine as announced by the President may have been much too broad. It was mere demagoguery to claim that it was intended to confer upon the people of New York City, or Pittsburgh, or San Francisco, or the people of any other political subdivision of the United States, to withdraw from the Union and set up a government of their own. The phrases were especially intended to cover the cases of conquered peoples.

Giving the words employed that construction, they do not embrace either the parts of continental America or any of the possessions of America. Moreover, they were intended to apply to peoples reasonably capable of self-government and capable of maintaining a national existence.

The people of the Virgin Islands could not set up a government; neither could they maintain it if once established.

None of our possessions are capable of it. The Filipinos may be approaching it, and we are under a very solemn pledge to give them their liberty so soon as they are capable of maintaining a government.

Mr. President, when Ireland was conquered the Irish people were one people; they had a government and a civilization; they had education far beyond the education of the people of England at the time they were conquered. They have been held in subjection by fire and sword. They have never ceased to protest.

Are they capable of government? Who dares deny their capacity to govern themselves? Notwithstanding the abuses under which they have suffered, there are still 5,000,000 of Irish in Ireland. They have our religion; they have our language; they have a knowledge of the fundamentals of our laws. They love liberty as passionately as we love it. They will be able, if given the right, to conduct a peaceful State. The fact does not admit of dispute.

The greatest orators who have ever spoken the English tongue have been Irishmen; the great generals who have commanded the armies of Britain have been Irishmen; Ireland's poets have sung the sweetest songs that ever thrilled the heart of man; Irish sculptors have chiseled in marble the marvelous visions of their souls; Irish patriots have rotted in English prisons without a murmur upon their lips; Irish martyrs have ascended the scaffold and gloried in the privilege to die for race and country. Wherever the hand of the oppressor has been taken from the throat of an Irishman, he has proven himself the equal of any other man on earth. Irishmen have builded and managed great railway systems, organized vast industries, conceived and consummated the mightiest of enterprises. They have filled the highest positions of honor and of trust. Irish names were signed to the Declaration of Independence; Ireland's sons crowded into the Revolutionary armies, forming more than 33 per cent of the total of the Continental soldiery; Irish blood was poured out on every battle field of the Revolution; Irish heroes, with flashing eyes and cheering lips, followed Paul Jones as he sprang from the deck of his sinking vessel and by the aid of the sword captured the triumphant British man-of-war. The immediate descendant of an Irishman humbled the pride of Great Britain at the Battle of New Orleans and restored the tarnished glory of American arms. Andrew Jackson lives in history as one of the greatest American Presidents. It is stated on reliable authority that the present Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court is the grandson of an Irish rebel of '98. Associate Justice McKenna's name tells the story of his origin. A recent author—"The Irish in the United States," by Michael J. O'Brien—declares:

Of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, Thornton, Taylor, and Smith were natives of Ireland; McKean, Read, and Rutledge were of Irish parentage; Lynch and Carroll were grandsons of Irishmen; Whipple and Hancock were of Irish descent on the maternal side; and O'Hart (Irish Pedigrees) declares that Robert Treat Paine was a great-grandson of Henry O'Neill, hereditary prince of Ulster, who "changed his name to that of one of his maternal ancestors so as to save his estates." It was an Irishman who first read the immortal document to the public; an Irishman first printed it; and an Irishman published it for the first time with facsimiles of the signatures.

At least six American Presidents had more or less of the Celtic strain. President Jackson, whose parents came from County Down, more than once expressed his pride in his Irish ancestry. Arthur's parents were from Antrim, Buchanan's from Donegal, and McKinley's grandparents came from the same vicinity. Theodore Roosevelt boasts among his ancestors two direct lines from Ireland, and the first American ancestor of President Polk was a Pollock from Donegal. The present occupant of the White House, Woodrow Wilson, is also of Irish descent. Among the distinguished Vice Presidents of the United States were George Clinton and John C. Calhoun, sons of immigrants from Longford and Donegal, respectively, and Calhoun's successor as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations was John Smilie, a native of Newtownards, County Down.

Among American governors since 1800, we find such names as Barry, Brady, Butler, Carroll, Clinton, Conway, Carney, Connolly, Curtin, Collins, Donaghey, Downey, Early, Fitzpatrick, Flannegan, Geary, Gorman, Hannegan, Kavanagh, Kearney, Logan, Lynch, Murphy, Moore, McKinley, McGill, Meagher, McGrath, Mahone, McCormick, O'Neal, O'Ferrall, Orr, Roane, Filey, Sullivan, Sharkey, Smith, Talbot, and Welsh, all of Irish descent. To-day we have as governors of States, Glynn in New York, Dunne in Illinois, Walsh in Massachusetts, O'Neal in Alabama, Burke in North Carolina, Carey in Wyoming, McGovern in Wisconsin, McCreary in Kentucky, and Tener in Pennsylvania, and not alone is the governor of the last-mentioned State a native of Ireland, but so also are its junior United States Senator, the secretary of the Commonwealth, and its adjutant general.

In the political life of America many of the sons of Ireland have risen to eminence, and in the legislative halls at the National Capital the names of Kelly, Fitzpatrick, Broderick, Casserly, Farley, Logan, Harlan, Hannegan, Adair, Barry, Rowan, Gorman, Kennedy, Lyon, Fitzgerald, Fair, Sewall, Kernan, Butler, Moore, Regan, Mahone, Walsh, and Flannegan are still spoken of with respect among the lawmakers of the Nation. William Darrah Kelly served in Congress for 50 years, and it remained for James Shields to hold the uniquie distinction of representing three different States, at different times, in the Senate of the United States. Senator Shields was a native of County Tyrone.

In the judiciary have been many shining lights of Irish origin. The Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court is Edward D. White, grandson of a 1798 rebel, and one of his ablest associates is Joseph McKenna. No more erudite or profound lawyer than Charles O'Conor has adorned his profession, and it can be said with truth that his career has remained unrivaled in American history. James T. Brady, Daniel Dougherty, Thomas Addis Emmet, and Charles O'Neill were among the most eminent lawyers America has known, while the names of Dennis O'Brien, chief justice of the New York Court of Appeals; John D. O'Neill, who occupied a like elevated place on the bench of South Carolina; John D. Phelan, of the Alabama Supreme Court; Richard O'Gorman, Charles P. Daly, Hugh Rutledge, Morgan J. O'Brien, and others of like origin, are household words in the legal annals of America. There is no State in the Union where an Irish-American lawyer has not distinguished himself.

The history of medicine in the United States is adorned with the names of many physicians of Irish birth or blood. Several Irish surgeons rendered valuable services in the Army of the Revolution, among whom are found Drs. McDonough, McHenry, McCloskey, McCalla, Burke, Irvine, and Williamson. Dr. John Cochran was appointed by Washington Surgeon General of the Army. Dr. James Lynah, of Charleston, a native of Ireland, became surgeon general of South Carolina in recognition of his valuable services to the patriot Army. Dr. John McKinley, a native of Ireland, who was a famous physician in his day, became the first governor of Delaware. Dr. Ephraim McDowell is known in the profession as the "Father of Ovariotomy," as is Dr. William J. McNevin the "Father of American Chemistry." Dr. John Byrne, of New York, had a world-wide fame, and his papers on gynecology have been pronounced by the medical press as "the best printed in any language." One of the most conspicuous figures in medicine in the United States was Dr. Jerome Cochran, of Alabama. Drs. Junius F. Lynch, of Florida; Charles McCreery, of Kentucky; Hugh McGuire and Hunter McGuire, of Virginia; Matthew C. McGannon, of Tennessee; and James Lynch, Charles J. O'Hagan, and James McBride, of South Carolina, are mentioned prominently in the histories of their respective localities as the foremost medical men of their times, while in Wisconsin the pioneer physician was Dr. William H. Fox, and in Oregon Dr. John McLoughlin. Among New York physicians who achieved high reputations in their profession were Drs. Thomas Addis Emmet, Frank A. McGuire, Daniel E. O'Neill, Charles McBurney, Isaac H. Reiley, Alfred L. Carroll, Howard A. Kelly, Joseph O'Dwyer, and James J. Walsh. These and many others of Irish descent have been honored by medical societies as leaders and specialists, while it can be said that no surgeon of the present day has achieved such a world-wide reputation as Dr. John B. Murphy, of Chicago. Among experts in medico-legal science the names of Drs. Benjamin W. McCreedy and William J. O'Sullivan, of New York, stand out prominently, and among the most noted contributors to medical journals in the United States, and recognized as men of great professional skill and authorities in their respective specialties, have been Drs. F. D. Mooney, of St. Louis; Thomas Fitzgibbon, of Milwaukee; John D. Hanrahan, of Rutland; James McCann and James H. McClelland, of Pittsburgh; John A. Murphy and John McCurdy, of Cincinnati; John Keating, of Philadelphia; John H. Murphy, of St. Paul; John W. C. O'Neal, of Gettysburg; and Arthur O'Neill, of Meadville, Pa. Indeed, it can be said that American medical science owes an incalculable debt to Irish genius.

Theodore Vail, the presiding genius of the greatest telephone system in the world, is Irish, and so is Carty, its chief engineer. Morse, the inventor of the telegraph, was the grandson of an Irishman; Henry O'Reilly built the first telegraph line in the United States; and John W. Mackey was the president of the Commercial Cable Co. John P. Holland, the inventor of the submarine torpedo boat, was a native of County Clare; and McCormick, the inventor of the reaping and mowing machine, was an Irishman's grandson.

Sons of Irishmen have stood in the front rank of American statesmen and diplomats who represented their country abroad. To mention but a few: Richard O'Brien, appointed by Jefferson American representative at Algiers; James Kavanagh, minister to Portugal; and Louis McLane, minister to England in 1829 and afterwards Secretary of State in 1832. In recent years an O'Brien has represented American interests in Italy and Japan; a Kerens in Austria; an Egan in Chili and another of the same name in Denmark; an O'Shaughnessy in Mexico; a Sullivan in Santo Domingo; and an O'Rear in Bolivia.

Among historians were John Gilmary Shea, author of numerous historical works; Dr. Robert Walsh, a learned historian and journalist of the last century, whose literary labors were extensive; McMahon and McSherry, historians of Maryland; Burk, of Virginia; O'Callaghan, Hastings, and Murphy, of New York; Ramsay, of South Carolina; and Williamson, of North Carolina, all native Irishmen or sons of Irish immigrants.

In the field of American journalism have been many able and forcible writers of Irish birth or descent. Hugh Gaine, a Belfast man, founded the New York Mercury in 1775. John Dunlap founded the first daily paper in Philadelphia, John Daly Burk published the first daily paper in Boston, and William Duane edited the Aurora of Philadelphia in 1795. All these were born in Ireland. William Coleman, founder of the New York Evening Post in 1801, was the son of an Irish rebel of 1798; Thomas Fitzgerald founded the Philadelphia Item; Thomas Gill, the New York Evening Star; Patrick Walsh, the Augusta Chronicle; Joseph Medill, the Chicago Tribune. Henry W. Grady edited the Atlanta Constitution; Michael Dee edited the Detroit Evening News for nearly 50 years; Richard Smith, the Cincinnati Gazette; Edward L. Godkin, the New York Evening Post; William Laffan, the New York Sun; and Horace Greeley, the New York Tribune. All of these were either natives of Ireland or sprung from immigrant Irishmen, as were Oliver of the Pittsburg Gazette, O'Neill of the Pittsburgh Despatch, John Keating of Memphis, William D. O'Connor, and many other shining lights of American journalism during the last century. Fitz James O'Brien was "a bright, particular star" in the journalistic firmament; John MacGahan achieved fame as a war correspondent; Patrick Barry, of Rochester, an extensive writer on horticulural and kindred subjects, was the recognized leader of his craft in the United States; and William Darby, son of Patrick and Mary Darby, and Michael Twomey were the ablest American geographers and writers on abstruse scientific subjects.

In the field of poetry we have had Theodore O'Hara, the author of that immortal poem, The Bivouac of the Dead; John Boyle O'Reilly; Thomas Dunn English, author of Ben Bolt; Father Abram Ryan, "the poet priest of the South"; James Whitcomb Riley; Eleanor Donnelly; M. F. Egan; T. A. Daly; and Joseph I. C. Clarke, president of the American Irish Historical Society.

To recount the successful men of affairs of Irish origin it would be necessary to mention every branch of business and every profession. Recalling but a few, Daniel O'Day, Patrick Farrelly, John and William O'Brien, Alexander T. Stewart, John Castree, Joseph J. O'Donohue, William R. Grace, John McConville, Hugh O'Neill, Alexander E. Orr, William Constable, Daniel McCormick, and Dominick Lynch, all of New York, were dominant figures in the world of business. Thomas Mellon, of Pittsburgh; John R. Walsh and the Cudahy brothers, of Chicago; James Phelan, Peter Donahue, Joseph A. Donohoe, and John Sullivan, of San Francisco; William A. Clark and Marcus Daly, of Montana; George Meade, the Meases and the Nesbits, Thomas Fitz-Simmons and Thomas Dolan, of Philadelphia; Columbus O'Donnell and Luke Tiernan, of Baltimore, all these have been leading merchants in their day. Few American financiers occupy a more conspicuous place than Thomas F. Ryan, and no great industrial leader has reached the pinnacle of success upon which stands the commanding figure of James J. Hill, both sons of Irishmen. The names of Anthony N. Brady, Eugene Kelly, James S. Stranahan, and James A. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation, are household words in business and financial circles.

Why have the Irish not succeeded in Ireland? Because British laws have oppressed them, because British troops have held them in subjection, because their lands were stolen, because their factories were demolished and their trade cut off.

This reservation is, indeed, an innocuous thing in one aspect, but it does express the sympathy of this body and it does inject into the League of Nations the proposition that that people shall some day have a hearing.

It is idle to prate of the Virgin Islands, populated by a few ignorant natives and scarcely large enough for a Missouri farmer to operate a farm tractor. The people appear to be incapable of self-support, and we are asked to aid them and will aid them. To compare the Irish people with the inhabitants of the Virgin Islands is to insult a proud and generous race.

Let us face the matter as it is. There are some Senators who do not want to vote a reservation favorable to Ireland. They have consumed an entire day in trying to dodge that issue. Senators, we are going to vote on it one way or the other before we quit. I am determined that you shall not evade the issue. Each Senator will have to cast his vote. I hope that we shall do it frankly and bravely. Let us say to the people of the world what we ought to say, that in this, as in every other great struggle of a great people for their liberty, the heart of America goes out to them.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to state that in voting on the last amendment I voted under a misapprehension, thinking the question was upon the original reservation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to state that in voting for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] striking out the reference to "self-determination" in the reservation, I did so because I do not believe that we are in any way broadly committed to such a docrtine, and clearly the conference at Paris rejected it. I think such language in connection with ratification would hinder ratification of the league rather than promote it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GERRY and Mr. PHELAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GERRY. I move to amend by inserting the word "such" in lieu of the word "independence" in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. I understand the Senator from Tennessee has moved to amend by inserting the word "independence."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee modify his amendment accordingly?

Mr. SHIELDS. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the names of Mr. ASHURST and Mr. BALL were called.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I was on my feet before the roll call began, and as yet there has been no response. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know what is before the Senate, and I ask that the Secretary may state the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Mr. SHIELDS moves to strike out the compounded word "self-government," in line 6, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "independence"; and Mr. GERRY moves in lieu of the word "independence" to insert the word "such."

Mr. REED. How would it then read?

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. So that it will read:

And declares that when such is attained by—

Mr. GERRY. It should read "such government."

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "self" and to insert the word "such."

Mr. SHIELDS. I raise the point of order that the amendment can not be made after the roll call has begun.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. REED. What is the question on which we are voting? We are entitled to know that in this confusion. Can it not be stated?

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In line 6 it is proposed to strike out the word "self-government" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "independence."

Mr. PHELAN. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California will state it.

Mr. PHELAN. The Chair has just ruled that a Senator can not make a motion after the roll call has begun. The Senator from Rhode Island was on his feet and was actually recognized by the Chair and moved his amendment. Therefore, I hold—and I hope the Chair will agree with this view—that the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not in order in the way in which it is now stated. The Chair, however, does not desire to prevent a vote upon any question that may be suggested.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Rhode Island did not understand that the roll call had commenced when he made his motion. He did not think that the first Senator had answered to his name when called. I was on my feet before the roll call began.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Had the Chair recognized the Senator from Rhode Island to make the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is obvious that the Senator from Rhode Island might be recognized and yet the amendment which he proposed might not be in order at that time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not present at the time. Was the amendment declared out of order at the time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has held that, in his opinion, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island is not in order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not referring now to the ruling of the Chair that the amendment was out of order on the ground that the roll call had begun, for the Senator from Rhode Island was on his feet and offering his amendment before the roll call was begun. The Senator from Rhode Island has offered an amendment which is clearly in order. It is not in the third degree; there is only one amendment pending, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Rhode Island state his amendment again? The Chair does not desire to preclude any number of roll calls, of course.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee by striking out the word "independence" and inserting the words "such government."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the word "independence," proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Tennessee, it is proposed to insert the words "such government."

Mr. GERRY. Now, let the Secretary read the amendment as it will read if amended.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

And declares that when such government is attained by Ireland—

And so forth.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the elimination of the word "independence" will lead to some confusion unless it is explained. The reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is as follows:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany, the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919.

So the intent, as I understand, of the Senator from Rhode Island is now to declare that when "such government," that is, a government of their own choice—it may be independent or it may be less than independent, provided it is a government of their own choice—"when such a government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped now is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations."

Therefore, we are giving all that the Irish people themselves may ask or expect. I think the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is an improvement over the one proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, because it embraces more, it embraces not only independence, if that is the demand of the Irish people, but something less than independence, such as the independence possessed by Cuba, if that is the wish of the Irish people.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think it practically means the same thing when we refer back to "a government of their choice." Striking out the word "self" and putting in "such government," with that referring back to "their own choice," of course, improves the reservation very much.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. I withdraw my amendment, provided that is acceptable to the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island consent to the withdrawal of the amendment?

Mr. GERRY. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment as now modified by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, what is the question pending now? As I understand, the Senator from Rhode Island has a right to modify his own proposition, and he has done so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island not only has the right to modify it, but he has modified it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; and the Senator from Tennessee has withdrawn his amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the situation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. Then the roll is not to be called on what was pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair proposes now to ask whether the Senate is ready for the question.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Secretary state the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state it.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new reservation in the following words:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, is that reservation offered as a complete substitute for the one that I have in my hand?

Mr. LODGE. It is the original reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reservation as now offered is the reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, is an amendment to that in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On line 3, after the word "self-determination," I move to insert the words "as heretofore applied by it," so that it will read:

The United States adheres to the principle of self-determination as heretofore applied by it, and to the resolution—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, as the Assistant Secretary read the resolution, I noted that the word "now" was not in the one read by him. I understood that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had an amendment adopted which included the word "now," in line 7, after the word "hoped."

Mr. LODGE. I did not offer those two little verbal amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is in error with respect to that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to vote with some degree of intelligence on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, and I should like to understand just its meaning. Will the Senator be good enough to tell the Senate how the United States has heretofore applied the principle of self-determination?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the shortest answer I can make to that is that the United States has applied the principle of self-determination according to the rule of reason.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am asking for the specific instances of its application. It has rather applied it in the past, has it not, by denying it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Upon occasions, and upon other occasions by acceding to it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. When, may I ask the Senator, has the United States every applied the principle of self-determination of peoples in an affirmative way?

Mr. LODGE. It has applied it in the case of Hawaii. That is one case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Hawaii was not a part of the United States, I think, when she came in.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the Senator will let me answer his question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has applied it from time to time, to a greater or less degree, in several instances. It has applied it to quite an extensive degree in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the Senator think we have applied the principle of self-determination in the Philippines?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To a certain extent; yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suppose by that the Senator means that we have given the Philippine Islands a certain degree of self-government which comported with our own particular notions at the time as to how much we ought to hand down to them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly; yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is that the sort of self-determination that the Senator desires to be applied to Ireland?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the amendment that I have offered here does not apply to the Irish part of this reservation. It applies to the blanket declaration of our implicit adherence to the principle of self-determination. Then the reservation goes ahead and declares its sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people, and expresses the hope that they will attain self-government, or a government of their own choice. I do not seek to interfere with that part of it at all. That is not my purpose; but, as I attempted to state upon a former occasion, and as has been stated by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts, I regard the declaration contained in line 2 as a declaration which the United States could not carry out if it wanted to do so. It has not carried it out in the past in every instance, and it can not do so in the future; and I do not want to see the Senate of the United States utter a declaration which succeeding Congresses can not abide by in every instance. That is why I propose this amendment, namely, after the word "self-determination," to insert the words "as heretofore applied by it."

Mr. WOLCOTT. All I am asking the Senator to do, if he can, is to enlighten us as to what are the specific instances in our history when we have applied what we are pleased to call the principle of self-determination. Can the Senator tell us when we have done that? I want to know that so as to understand just the significance of the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I attempted to give examples a moment ago. Probably I can give more. We have applied the principle of self-determination, always using our own discretion, for example, with Cuba. We secured for Cuba almost absolute self-determination or independence. We have not done so for Porto Rico; we have not done so for the Virgin Islands; we have not done so for the Philippines. We have abided by the rule of reason, if I may use that illustration; that is to say, where we could encourage people and help people to self-government, we have done it as far as we could.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have helped to lift them up, we have helped to educate them, and we have extended self-rule to them in some instances much faster than in others. There may very possibly arise in the future instances where we can not extend self-government, where we can not extend self-determination; and yet, under the reservation as printed now and lying before the Senate we declare ourselves as adherents to the principle of self-determination.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment. This is the first time, according to my recollection, that any branch of the American Government has attempted to establish a doctrine of this kind. It may be that this will not become a part of the treaty which is before us; but, nevertheless, whatever we do in this connection will live as part of a declared policy and doctrine of the United States, and I want the Senate to go mighty carefully before it establishes a doctrine which some day may come back to plague us.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator if such a doctrine of self-determination as he has described is not precisely the same kind of doctrine that England is applying to Ireland to-day?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That question is beside the point. I am not discussing the relations of England and Ireland. I am discussing the policy and the doctrine to be announced by the Government of the United States as applicable to all of its undertakings in the future; that is all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator seeks to insert in the reservation the words "as heretofore applied by the United States." That is, he wants to limit the reservation so that we do not declare for the principle of self-determination as it is to be but as it has been under the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and I think that is the best example of self-determination the world has ever seen.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that that is an appeal to the past, applying the rule of the past, when we are now at the dawn of a new era?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have heard that stated, Mr. President, but——

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that this League of Nations is the proclamation of the new era; and is he not willing to take the new era, with all its benefits, without going back to the dead past to find the rule by which we are to act during the sunshine of this new day?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, Mr. President. I was about to yield the floor, but I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator if he will accept an amendment reading "as heretofore understood and applied by the United States"?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my recollection of our history is that, as we have understood it, we have applied it. Will not the word "applied" cover everything that the Senator needs? Why make it more difficult to understand by putting in other words?

Mr. PHELAN. I have a specific purpose; otherwise I would not have suggested it. Does the Senator see any objection to using the words "as understood and applied"?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I think it adds confusion.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator refuses.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. LODGE. What authority is there to state how we have understood it? There is nothing except our actions that will show how we have understood it.

Mr. PHELAN. I will reveal now what I had in mind.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That will be very interesting.

Mr. PHELAN. I refer to the Declaration of Independence—"that all men are created equal" and "endowed with certain inalienable rights," and in order "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed"; and, therefore, if we put in here the words "understood and applied," we will be reaffirming the Declaration of Independence. I think that should be acceptable to any American Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say only a single word. The limitation suggested by the Senator from New York seems to me to be very good. I shall be very happy to vote for the reservation if those words are added.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the last time the question of self-government or self-determination was up in the Senate it was rejected in toto. About four years ago we had up the question of giving independence to the Philippine Islands. It was debated here for weeks, and it was rejected. I do not suppose that the Senator from New York has that in view, but if we are to take the last application of the principle of self-determination, of course it would make this reservation utterly meaningless and absurd, because that whole question was gone over here in the Senate, the question of the right of peoples to have governments that they wanted was debated, and after debates of weeks we passed the bill which rejected it.

I do not think that it would give Ireland very much consolation if we should adopt this.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator have in mind, then, that the Senate should now, in this reservation, declare a new policy in contradiction to the policy which the Senator says has been the policy of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I venture to say to the Senator that the Senator from Idaho was one of the men who seriously opposed the bill, voted against it, and undertook at that time to apply the principle of self-determination, and to give the Filipinos the independence to which they are entitled.

Mr. LENROOT. But my inquiry was, Should a question of such tremendous consequence to the future of the United States, as the Senator says, entirely changing the policy of the United States, be adopted at this time under these circumstances?

Mr. BORAH. I will say, in answer to that, that as I look upon the question of the principle of self-determination, it is nothing more than self-government, and while I have not brought in these amendments, I am not going to vote against the principle of self-government. There may be, when the time arises, peculiar and particular circumstances which reasonable people wish to apply, and which might postpone the actual application of the principle. But when you have before you the principle of self-government, certainly you can not take a position as a people that you are opposed to it. I am not willing to take that position.

Let me say further, Mr. President, that I think we have trimmed this reservation down until it is very discreditable to the United States Senate already. Here are Korea, Persia, Syria, Egypt, and these other countries, just as much entitled to a declaration of this principle as is Ireland. It is not a question of how many votes there are in this country; it is a question of honor and a question of principle, and we ought to apply it in such way that it will reach Egypt just as quickly as it will reach Ireland; that it will reach all alike. I venture to believe that the Irish people, of all people, would never ask anything which they would not accord to all other subject peoples.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator from Delaware, if he is opposed to the amendment of the Senator from New York, whether it is his intention, so far as his vote is concerned, to declare a new policy upon the part of the United States that shall extend to the Hawaiian Islands, that shall extend to Porto Rico, that shall extend to the Philippine Islands, and even extend to the individual States of the Union?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I had thought that I might make a few remarks on this reservation before a vote was taken.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield the floor, then.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But I am perfectly willing to state to the Senator that I believe that if by reservation, resolution, or what not, the Senate of the United States undertakes to dispose of the territories of other nations, the decent and respectable thing for the United States to do is to measure out some degree of justice to the people subject to themselves. That is my position.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, then do I understand the Senator from Delaware that he would apply that rule to each of the individual States of the Union, and that if any State desired to secede from the Union he is in favor of self-determination, so as to permit them to do so?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I thought the Senator was asking a serious question——

Mr. LENROOT. I was.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And not intending to ask anything ridiculous. Categorically, I answer the question no. I have not yet said, Mr. President, that I am in favor of this reservation. Unless I have a violent change of mind, I shall vote against the reservation, because I am unwilling to have the Senate of the United States undertake to dispose of the territory of Great Britain when it will not do anything to relieve the subject peoples within its own territory.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question: Has not the Supreme Court declared that this is an indestructible Union of indestructible States?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but the Senator, I take it, would now declare a policy upon the part of the Senate of the United States that would mean the destruction of the Union; and the Supreme Court after all merely carries out the Constitution as it exists. Evidently the Senator from California, in carrying out that policy, would be willing to amend the Constitution so as to permit any State to secede.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator is entirely gratuitous in his assumption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], which the Secretary will state, so that every Senator may know what it is.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the word "self-determination," as printed on line 3 of the proposed amendment, insert the words "as heretofore applied by it," so that if amended it will read:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination as heretofore applied by it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. OWEN'S name was called). The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. If present, the Senator from Oklahoma would vote "nay" on this proposition.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). On account of the absence of my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of illness, to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER]. I ask that this announcement of my pair and its transfer may stand for the balance of the day. I vote "nay" on the pending proposition.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). The junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], with whom I am paired, is not in the Chamber. I must therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. I am paired with that Senator, and I withhold my vote.

So Mr. WADSWORTH'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the amendment I am about to offer. My purpose being to limit the declaration of principle, which I have already discussed, and avoid a general declaration in this reservation, I move to insert, after the word "determination," the words "for the people of Ireland."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In line 3, after the word "determination," insert the words "for the people of Ireland."

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Let the reservation be reported as it would read if the amendment were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the reservation as it would read if the amendment should be agreed to.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination for the people of Ireland and to the resolution of sympathy for the aspirations of the Irish people.

Mr. REED. May I make an inquiry, Mr. President? What does the expression "self-determination for the people of Ireland" mean?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator can word it any better, very well. I think he probably grasps my meaning. We adhere to the principle of self-determination for the people of Ireland. It may not be clear, but if the Senator can make it any clearer, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. BORAH. It is perfectly clear. It excludes everybody from the principle except Ireland.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will pardon me, it excludes everybody from the declaration of this reservation except the people of Ireland.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. We insert "Ireland"——

Mr. LODGE. That is all the reservation applies to.

Mr. BORAH. But we withhold the principle from Egypt, from Korea, and from all other nations, and even from ourselves, notwithstanding the fact that we are proposing to join this league in which we will have to do with all those other peoples.

Mr. LODGE. All I want to do is to limit it to the subject of the reservation. I wish to say that we favor self-determination for the people of Ireland. If I have not said it clearly, some one else no doubt can make it more clear. My own belief is that I have stated it clearly. I do not want to delay the Senate, and I should like to have a vote.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand it, it is perfectly clear. I am not objecting to its ambiguity. It is its lack of ambiguity that I dislike.

Mr. THOMAS. If the text is now clear of all these other nations and all these other peoples, so that the reservation affects only Ireland, can we not take a vote upon it?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; we can; and perhaps get the votes in return for it. Since this debate started some 14 months ago, I have been very often criticized for being so strongly sympathetic with the Irish people, supposing that I was doing it for personal reasons, but I will not take a correct fundamental principle and apply it to one people and deny it to all others. I think we ought to leave the principle stand in its fullness. It will never bother us in the least when it comes to the practical proposition of using our intelligence and our reason at the time, because we have always done that and always will do so. Senators need not be uneasy about that. This is a proposition of the Senate of the United States, with nearly 20,000,000 people in the United States of Irish blood, just at the beginning of a political campaign, applying the great principle of self-government to no one except those who can vote. It is the most—I must say that language fails one when it comes to discussing such action upon the part of the Senate. Have we lost all self-respect and all sense of decency toward the world, that we shall withhold from the subject peoples who are oppressed and with whom we are to deal in the future under this league this great fundamental principle which has been a part of our faith for 150 years and placed there by the blood and suffering of our forbears? Why, if for no other reason on earth than that we are afraid to face the situation politically in the United States and deny to these people who have the vote that which we refuse to those who have not the vote?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am glad to find that once I am in accord with the Senator from Idaho. If the right of a part of a nation to secede and to be supported by the rest of the world is a great principle that ought to be announced, let us apply it to all the world. Let us not apply it to one country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent. If present he would vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], I vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. OWEN's name was called). The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If present he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE].

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). By reason of the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HENDERSON. Making the same announcement as before regarding my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN. May I inquire if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—26.

So Mr. LODGE's amendment to Mr. GERRY's reservation was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the reservation proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

Mr. McKELLAR. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I want to say just a word to make my position clear. If this reservation did not contain, as I feel convinced that it does, a very positive misstatement of the policy of this country, I would gladly vote for it. I do not feel that it is necessary in expressing our views in favor of Irish independence to go to this extent and to lumber the proposed reservations in this manner and make a statement as to policy which all know we are not carrying out with our own possessions. Therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as I indicated in my remarks a few moments ago, I believe the first portion of this reservation constitutes an exceedingly dangerous announcement of doctrine, which the United States will not follow in the future. I would cheerfully support a repetition of the expression of opinion made by the Senate of the United States on June 6, 1919, in regard to Ireland. But with this reservation carrying the objectionable declaration into the treaty itself, it is utterly impossible for me to vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are requested. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, before the final vote is taken I desire, I confess for my own satisfaction rather than for the enlightenment of the Senate, to say just a few words as briefly as I can.

Mr. President, I regret that this subject is up at this particular time. As I view the matter, this reservation is not germane to the treaty of peace which is before us. I am interested in seeing the Senate give its advice and consent to the making of the treaty of peace by the President. In all the votes which I have cast and in all the thoughts which I have had since this debate started last year I have voted and thought with respect only to the welfare of the treaty. This reservation has no reference to any obligation that the treaty of peace imposes upon the United States; this reservation has no reference to any article in the treaty of peace.

Why, Mr. President, is it offered? The reservations, if I understand them correctly, are meant to notify the cosignatories to the treaty of our understanding, if the reservations be interpretive, or of our withholding, so far as we are concerned, our assent to some of the terms of the obligation. What obligation is there in the treaty of peace that calls for this reservation? I am one of those who argued last fall, when the subject was then before the Senate, that the treaty of peace, the League of Nations covenant, in no wise committed us to contribute of our force or of our money to the continued enthralment, if you choose, of Ireland; on the contrary, I argued at that time that the League of Nations covenant provided a machinery whereby Ireland would get her day in court.

Mr. President, if my interpretation of the treaty is correct in that regard, I would be guilty of self-stultification should I vote for a reservation—for something which is named a reservation—which would seem to go on the assumption that the treaty of peace takes away from Ireland the aspiration which she so properly entertains. The reservation is here, not in any wise germane to the subject matter—I am compelled to speak in frankness, if I speak at all—the reservation is here to cater to Irish votes. I decline as a Senator of the United States, Mr. President, solely for the sake of political advantage in the pending election to cast a vote upon this great document, which ought to be considered seriously and solemnly by the Senate in the spirit of statesmen addressing themselves to the determination of the great question of peace and its terms.

In saying this I wish it distinctly understood that I am not to be numbered among those who would suppress the aspirations of Ireland. Rather than have any quarrel with the expressions of sympathy for that people, I indorse the sentiment of the resolution adopted by the Senate last June, in which this body recorded itself as sympathetic, in the language of the resolution, "with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of its own choice." So any vote that I cast upon this reservation I cast in full sympathy with that announcement.

We are asked now to repeat that announcement made so recently as nine months ago. Is it necessary, I ask the Senate, for this body to make constant repetitions of the announcement put forth in solemn resolutions? Is it necessary that the Senate of the United States, with the rise of every morning's sun repeat what it said, so to speak, the day before? I decline to be a party, so far as my vote is concerned, to such a performance.

Mr. President, I am interested in seeing the Senate give a two-thirds vote to the ratification of the treaty.

I am convinced—I will modify that language—I feel strongly that this reservation, in part at least, is born out of a spirit of animosity and enmity to the treaty of peace. I have constantly voted against all amendments to the treaty; I have voted uniformly against every reservation which has been offered to the treaty upon the theory that if we made amendments the pathway of the treaty would be bestrewn with difficulties; that if we made reservations the pathway of the treaty would likewise be bestrewn with difficulties. So I have voted against some reservations which did not offend my judgment; some reservations which had it not been that I feared the result in the ultimate negotiation of the treaty would have obstructed its possible acceptance, I should have accepted and voted for. Now, I am asked by the pending reservation to cast a vote for a reservation out of line with that whole consistent policy throughout this entire debate which I have followed.

If a reservation which were reasonable or approached being reasonable would endanger the progress of the treaty, what, may I ask, is calculated to be the effect of this particular reservation? For this reservation presents the rather curious spectacle, if adopted, of the United States, through its President, depositing an instrument of ratification, giving his consent to a treaty on behalf of the United States inviting England, one of the cosignatories, to accept our assent; and in that very same breath notifying her that by that acceptance she has accepted our announcement that if not directly, at least indirectly, we are desiring to dismember, in part, her Empire.

If the reservation has anything upon which it can be reasonably predicated in connection with the treaty, it is upon the proposition that it recognizes the principle of self-determination of peoples; in my judgment, it has no other basis upon which to stand.

I am impressed with the fact, Mr. President, that if we are going to undertake by our action in this body to dispose of the territories of the cosignatories to this treaty, decency requires that we begin first to consider whether we ought not to measure out some degree of justice to those territories of our own which are inhabited by people who claim that they are subject races unwillingly living under our rule. Before we can see clearly to cast the mote out of England's eye, let us see if it be not possible to cast the beam out of our own eye. I have not discovered that we have been very much concerned, as regards our own action at least, with the principle of self-determination. Candor compels me to say that the principle of self-determination, so far as I have discovered it in the world heretofore, has been a principle very beautiful in its application to everybody but ourselves. The Hawaiians, I believe, if they do not aspire to independence of us, at least aspire to statehood; the Filipinos once fought us for independence; and, as pointed out by the Senator from Idaho, Congress rejected their plea of independence. I am not aware of a single, solitary instance in all of our history where we have applied, even in the minutest degree, the principle of self-determination to any portion of our territory.

Now, if this were a proposition, separate and distinct from the treaty and disentangled therefrom, to express sympathy with the Irish people in their struggle for independence, I would not withhold my vote; but, believing as I do, Mr. President, that this reservation, if adopted, will endanger the treaty of peace notwithstanding the fact that to some men it may seem to be an unpopular political vote that I cast, I shall unhesitatingly cast a vote against the reservation. By so doing I shall vote in the interest of the larger principle which is before us, and in the full and satisfying consciousness that thereby in this great controversy I have not cast my vote in obedience to the miserable plea of party advantage.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, just a word before the vote upon this reservation is taken. I do not know what motive was behind the introduction of the reservation; but those mightily interested in the principle will know in good time. I do not know whether the motive was to kill the treaty, or whether it was to give an honest expression of sympathy to a great and inspiring cause. Before this reservation is defeated—if it is to be defeated—I wish to have the RECORD show that it may be due to the fact that there are two issues here involved, and that the failure of the Senate to eliminate and separate these issues may be the reason for its defeat. Those issues are, first, the allegation in favor of the general principle of self-determination, and, second, the expression of sympathy for the Irish cause.

Mr. President, no person representing the friends of this cause have asked for this reservation; no one has petitioned for it; no one at their request has presented it; no one has asked the Senate to take a position on it; but it is here. A negative vote means much harm, much injury throughout the world to this cause; and I ask the Senate to pause and think and reflect upon that aspect of this matter before we finally act.

I have voted for every motion to make it easier for Senators who have said, on the other side of the Chamber and on this side, that they wanted to vote for the general principle of sympathy to the Irish cause involved in this measure; and I say it is to be regretted that this cause is to be injured—and injured it may be—by notice to the world that the United States Senate does not sympathize with these people because of technicalities, because of amendments, because of phraseology, because of shifting motions back and forth. The American people who are interested in this cause will scan this day's RECORD, and they will be able to know who sincerely and honestly are in sympathy with the underlying principle contained in the reservation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator expresses the belief that this reservation may be defeated. He expresses the belief that its defeat will injure the cause the world over. In view of that fact, does the Senator think the reservation ought to be withdrawn?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I did not offer the reservation. I did not ask to have it offered, but I am tremendously interested in preventing its defeat. I ask that the United States Senate take no action to injure and deny the moral support of the American people to a cause as worthy and as righteous as this cause. I said the reservation may be defeated—the vote will be very close. It appears so now, from declarations made upon one side and the other. I will not withdraw the reservation, but I want the American people to know why it may be defeated and what the cause will be for its defeat if it is not passed by a decisive majority. There are two propositions involved here that many Senators want separated. There are Senators in this Chamber in favor of both principles, some others are in favor of one and against the other, and there is not an opportunity for a clear, direct vote on the straight question of Ireland's aspirations for independence.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. GERRY. I do not believe that the reservation is going to be defeated. I believe it is going to be adopted. I disagree with the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It will be adopted if the 42 Senators who voted to keep in the reservation "adhering to the principle of self-determination" record their votes "yea" when the reservation is voted on. If Senators only did that for the purpose of embarrassing Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and now change their votes, the reservation will be defeated, and it will be defeated because of difference over phrases and words to the possible injury of the great principle here involved. I want that clear in the RECORD. It will be carried if the 42 Senators in this Chamber who voted to keep in the reservation the principle of self-determination as a general policy support it. It will be defeated if any number of these 42 Senators change their votes.

I would not have said what I have, Mr. President, but for the fact—and I say it with great sincerity—that I do not want the world to understand by any possible adverse vote that the Senate has repudiated this cause or belittled it or ignored it; for it is a cause too dear to the hearts of the friends of these subject people to have it dragged in here, thrown from one side of the Chamber to the other, attacked by motion after motion, amendment after amendment, and then finally killed. The cause is worthy of something better, and I want the RECORD to show before the vote is taken at least that it is not the honest, true sentiment of the Senate if there is a negative vote. Let us meet this issue squarely and fairly with a direct application of this principle to the cause of these people. Let us adopt this reservation and not give a deadly blow to the cause of liberty by rejecting it. Let wavering Senators reflect upon what rejection may mean, especially after this long discussion and in view of the fact that the Senate has entered upon a consideration of the merits of this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reservation offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

Mr. McKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been heretofore called for and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). My colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Transferring my general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], I vote "nay."

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. Not being able to get a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). I was requested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to announce his necessary absence, and that he is paired with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].
